But, Mr. President, referring to what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said as to what is going on there now since the armistice, it is the same as is going on in Korea, and she has pursued absolutely the same course in China that she has in Korea. Some of the evidence that I gave to the Senate at the time the treaty was up before I secured in person from a missionary who had come over here from that country. After he had given me this information, after I had presented it to the Senate, he returned to China and Korea and a week or two ago came back to this country again and he is in the city of Washington now. He told me when he came back that this profession that a change was taking place was without any truth. He told me in person that he had talked with the representative of the Japanese Government who has charge now of Korea. It has been stated and published to the world that floggings were going to cease over there. He told me there was nothing in it. He had just come from there, where he had seen the victims of the floggings that were going on now. He talked with this Japanese official and asked him why it was that they were still flogging people and the Japanese official gave him this reason for it: He said, "We are going to cease punishment of the people after a while, but we can not do it now, because all the prisons are full, and when we arrest people or they are charged with a crime we have no place to put them, and hence we flog them and let them go, if they are able to go." He said, "Just as soon as the Japanese Government can take the necessary action we are going to build a lot more prisons and then we will put people in prison instead of flogging them."

Think of it, Mr. President, every prison filled with people; not people who have been guilty of a crime, thousands of cases where no charge has ever been lodged against them of crime, incarcerated now, as he says, in prisons overflowing and crowded with men, women, and children, without any provision for sanitation or any other civilized method of caring for them.

I presume this reservation will be agreed to. I hope it will; but, Mr. President, it only partially meets the situation. The time will come, in my judgment, when the future historian writes the history of this country and of the action taken here that those who have favored striking this provision out of the treaty entirely, those who have favored rejecting it unless it is rectified, will be wholly vindicated.

We, with a great many other nations, went into the war, and when the war was over by these reservations, as I look at them, we are saying to the other Allies you can rape China, you can rob her, you can persecute her as much as you want to do, but we will take no hand in it. We ought to say, Mr. President, that this treaty shall never be approved by us until this and a good many other things like it are taken out of it and it is made into a modern, righteous document.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to reargue the Shantung matter, and I do not propose to detain the Senate longer than a very few moments. I rise principally to put into the RECORD some material which I have relating to this matter and of recent history, all of which relates to incidents and to matters transpiring since the 19th of last November.

I call particular attention, in the first instance, to an article written by ex-Senator Theodore E. Burton, who has just returned from the Orient and is now contributing some articles to the New York Times upon oriental questions. We all know how careful and how conservative the ex-Senator is in making statements. His article is interesting for rather what it suggests than for what it actually states. I read a paragraph or two from it to show the trend of his mind. The heading is "Shantung, a grave threat of China's dismemberment." I do not know of any student of oriental affairs—and when I say student of oriental affairs I mean those who are permitted to study that question upon the ground rather than those of us who are compelled to study it at a distance—who does not now regard Shantung as a first step in the dismemberment of China. That is practically the universal judgment of those who have studied the situation since the Versailles conference put out this treaty. That is evidently the conclusion at which ex-Senator Burton arrives. He says:

> If there is an ardent affection in the breast of a Chinaman for any part of his country it is for Shantung.

Then he gives the reasons, reasons with which we are very generally familiar. Further on the ex-Senator says:

> Japan has made various promises to surrender the territory involved, but the date and extent of the surrender are pending. * * * Tsingtau is certainly destined to become one of the most important maritime centers in the Far East. In addition to its commercial use it is becoming the most popular seashore resort in China.
> The central portion of Shantung Province is so important and its population and resources so considerable that the dominant position of any foreign power here would seriously threaten the dismemberment of China.
> It is the practically universal opinion that the control exercised by Japan since the expulsion of the Germans in the autumn of 1914 has been more severe and much more extensive than that of its predecessors.

I will not read the entire article, but simply paragraphs. He says, further:

> Last October all conductors, officials at stations, and most of the trainmen were Japanese. In addition, at each of the numerous stations, at average intervals of not more than 2 or 3 miles, there was a guard of Japanese soldiers, fully armed, who stood at attention while the train was at the station platform. The spacious barracks for soldiers which have been constructed or are under construction at many stations certainly look like permanent occupation.

There are only two classes of people in the world who believe that this is not permanent occupation. One of them I will not designate and the others are those who are not familiar with the facts. I read further:

> It is impossible to believe that in the face of repeated protestations and promises Japan will seek annexations of territory there; such a course would cause universal disapprobation and might be more injurious to Japan than to China herself.
> But will not the jurisdiction left to the Chinese be an empty shell? To use a comparison which was made at home in June: "What would be left of the State of Pennsylvania if a foreign country should be planted in Philadelphia and own the Pennsylvania Railway and the coal mines of the State?"

It is fair to say of Japan that Japan has never promised to return anything but the shell. She has never made any engagement to return the economic rights and interests which she received from Germany. Anyone who will study the assertions attributed to Japan and those which are known to have been made by Japan will conclude that Japan has always protected herself in the fact that she has made no promise of a return which would be anything but a return of an empty shell. When we take into consideration that for the last 15 years Japan has pursued an intelligent and most adroit and most persistent and most consistent course to the accomplishment of one great end, and now that she has realized it and that she is in possession of that which will dismember China and in possession of it by virtue of a treaty signed and ratified by the great powers of the earth, who supposes for a moment that China will ever receive anything from Shantung which will be of any possible benefit to her whatever?

She will have a political sovereignty which she can not exercise, which will not even be sufficient to enable her to protect her people.

I have an article here from George E. Sokolsky, manager of the China Bureau of Publicity, Shanghai, China, dated October 20. I read a single paragraph:

Japan, as Germany did not do, has been purchasing land in Shantung, although under the Chinese law foreigners may not hold land except in the treaty ports.

Japan, as Germany never did, has been charging a fee to the natives of Shantung for crossing the tracks of the Tsingtau-Tsinan Railroad, which has the practical effect of preventing peasants from farming on their own land in many instances where the tracks run through their land. The economic rights which Japan claims to inherit from Germany in Shantung practically amount to political rights, and because of the loan which the corrupt Peking Government has made of Japan, the latter has practically appointed its own government in the Province of Shantung.

I have an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, entitled "What Japan is doing in Shantung." I will not read the entire editorial. It is worth while, however, to read it if anyone is interested in knowing how Japan is redelivering Shantung to China.

After stating that Japan is seizing more firmly her hold upon Shantung, the editorial says:

She is doing it by intrenching herself not only in the German concession but everywhere throughout the peninsula; by securing control of vital railways and mineral rights; by pouring Japanese immigrants into the country; and by carrying on a campaign of dispossession which has never been paralleled, not even by the Germans in Poland or the Hungarians in Transylvania. Lands, stores, garden plots, fisheries, salt works, orchards, to mention only a few instances at random, business of all sorts everywhere have suddenly become Japanese. This has not been done by the crude method of open deprivation. The means adopted are "perfectly legal." A new regulation is introduced. A license is required to carry on business. The cost of the license is fixed at a quite unbearable sum, and, in the event of nonpayment, the property is seized at a nominal figure. "Chinese peasants," declared a citizen of the United States now residing in Shantung in a recent communication to this paper, "who for ages immemorial have made their living from coastal fisheries, have been charged $200 for these licenses, of course putting them out of business, their places on the fishing grounds being at once usurped by Japanese squatters.

So it goes on, and all the time in every conceivable way, whilst Japan is ostensibly quite scrupulous in her observance of the "open door," all foreign trade in the peninsula is being steadily frozen out.

That is under date of December 22, 1919. "And again Shantung," an editorial January 26, 1920, from the same paper, states that—

There is much more involved in this issue than Shantung, much more, even, than the future of China or of the Far East. It is this that places the Shantung question almost, if not entirely, in a class by itself, and renders any compromise upon it which would involve a betrayal of China really unthinkable. Practically all the other questions before the Senate arising out of the treaty are questions of policy. The Shantung question, whilst it is a question of policy, and of very high policy, is also a question of principle, and upon such a question there can be no compromise.

* * * * * * *

"The Japanese Government," he says—

Quoting Mr. Hodges, an American citizen—

"has broken faith in practically every political pact she has made with the powers and China and Korea since the Chino-Japanese war of 1894, generally violating the spirit, and frequently the letter, of her international obligations where it was necessary to carry out her aggressions against her eastern neighbors."

Again:

For some time past the Japanese authorities in Shantung have been engaged in a systematic exportation of the Chinese coinage from the peninsula, melting it down, sending it to Japan or elsewhere as bullion, and replacing it by paper money. The result of this manipulation is just what it was intended to be. The tremendous flood of paper money, without the backing of any metal currency, has effectively broken the exchange. The value of the Shantung coinage has dropped to a level where trade with any other country, with the single exception of Japan, is practically impossible. In Japan alone has the Shantung currency its full purchasing power.

Mr. President, it is difficult to discuss questions of this kind without making statements which ought not to be made against a great power like Japan. For myself, I have never entertained any feeling against Japan because of her nationality. The Japanese are a great people, a marvellous people; their progress during the last 50 years, indeed, marks them as one of the greatest peoples that have ever occupied a place in the history of the world; but they are a different people, they have a different civilization, they have a different conception and standard of conduct from ours. Their standard I have no desire to criticize, but from our standpoint we must view the matter as it presents itself to us.

Here is the situation: China has been a friendly nation throughout these years; she has followed with rare confidence and unmistakable fidelity the Government of the United States in practically all its leadership. The American Government has manifested its friendship for China; China has appreciated that friendship; she practically followed us into the recent war; and, in my judgment, there is no fidelity more true, peculiar as the Chinese people are in some respects, than the fidelity of the Chinaman. We are losing the friendship of China to-day for this reason: It does not make any difference how Senators may console themselves with the hope—and I doubt not they entertain that hope with all sincerity—that Shantung will be restored to China, it will be found when the books are finally made up that what we do here to-day is a mere mental reservation against a physical fact, and the physical fact will prevail. While we mentally reserve any approval of this transaction, nevertheless our President signed the treaty at Versailles and we ratify it with nothing in it save a mental reservation, as it were, as to Shantung. In the meantime we, as a people, know what is going on in Shantung. We know that China is being dispossessed; we know that her people are being driven out; that they are being denied their rights, in the face of the reservation which we adopted upon the 19th of November. What need we more in the way of proof to satisfy us that what we are to do to-day will not at all meet the supreme obligations which rest upon us toward a friendly nation?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. There may be very much in what the Senator says, and the conduct of Japan may call for the strictures and the condemnation which have been uttered here in the Senate; as to that I am now expressing no opinion; but what course does the Senator suggest should be pursued by the Senate of the United States in dealing with this treaty with respect to the Shantung provision? Assuming that there is no emendation of the treaty, what course shall the Senate pursue that will ameliorate the condition or will be of any advantage to China?

If I may further trespass upon the time of the Senator, the suggestion has frequently been made upon the floor of the Senate that with the League of Nations organized and the United States being one of the constituents of the organization, China's position would be far better than it would be if we were not within the league; that, with the traditional friendship which the United States has exhibited toward China, she would be in a position in the league to exert her powerful influence in behalf of China; that she could urge, and urge with great power, that Japan should redeem the promises which she has repeatedly made that Shantung—not only the shell, as the Senator from Idaho has used the expression, but the kernel and the substance—should be returned to China. I ask the Senator now if those statements are not accurate and if China's position will not be benefited if the United States is in the league? I ask the Senator the further question, what may we now do that would be of advantage to China in dealing with the question of reservations?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as to the Senator's first question as to what we may now do which will be of benefit to China, if I must answer that question as a practical proposition, I may say that we can do nothing more than adopt this reservation; but the Senator knows that there are those of us who have felt from the beginning and who still feel that the Shantung provisions ought to have been entirely stricken out of the treaty. I was not wholly satisfied with the proposition of an amendment which would restore Shantung to China, but I was thoroughly in favor of striking out the provision in the treaty, so that the matter would stand upon the relationship which existed between China and Japan, for I was of the opinion that the Versailles conference had nothing over which to assume jurisdiction in regard to the matter. I was of the opinion that when China entered the war all the rights of Germany were forfeited and went back to China and still belonged to China when the peace conference met at Versailles. At this time, of course, I know that we can do nothing but accept this reservation. The course we should have pursued, however, in the first instance, was to reject the proposition at Versailles, and, in the second instance, the Senate ought to have stricken it out of the treaty, if we ratified the treaty, and then permitted the matter to be settled according to the rights which existed under international law and under treaties which might have been in existence.

As to the second proposition, whether it is not better for us to go into the league, and that we might possibly be of some service to China in the league, first permit me to say that, while I am very anxious to render any possible service I can to China, going into the league is too high a price for me to be willing to pay even for that. I am not willing to take the chances that I think as a people we should take by going into the league.

Suppose, however, we should go into the league; suppose that the Senator who is now, as I am reliably informed, at the White House, finally satisfies the President with reference to the new reservations to article 10 and that we shall go into the league; suppose that the advocates of the reservation consent to the dotting of the "i" but refuse the crossing of the "t," and thereby compromise the differences, and we then go into the league; let us assume that that is true. When we get into the league Japan has absolute control of the situation. It can not be settled without Japan's consent; it would require unanimous consent of the council in order to readjust it. That is the complete answer to that, if I am correct in my construction of Japan's attitude. When we take into consideration that Japan refused to go into the league without——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment—without the Shantung provisions in the treaty, how shall we assume that when she is in the league she will of her own motion consent to waive them? Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to ask the Senator if it was not true that under the terms of the league itself Japan could not be a party to and could not participate in the decision of that question? So the provision requiring unanimous consent would not avail.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; in this particular matter Japan would be a party, but not so as to exclude her participation.

Mr. FLETCHER. She would be a party, but for that very reason could not participate in the settlement of the question.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know under what clause she would be excluded from being a party to it, because this is not——

Mr. FLETCHER. I say she would be a party, but for that very reason she could not participate in the decision of the question before the council or before the assembly of the league.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think this question would come under the clause of the covenant to which the Senator has reference—I am quite sure it would not—but let us take another view of it——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Florida that under the treaty certain portions of Shantung have been delivered to Japan. Should any question in regard to the matter come before the council of the League of Nations, Japan would be in a position to claim that, by the terms of the treaty, those portions of Shantung are a part of Japanese territory, and under article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations every member of the league has bound itself to protect and defend the sovereignty of Japan in that territory.

Mr. FLETCHER. But there would still remain the question of what rights Japan had conceded in consideration of the agreement reached on that subject in the treaty; in other words, the question would be raised about her consent eventually to transfer this territory to China.

Mr. BORAH. There is another answer to the Senator from Florida, and that is that this is a territory which has been guaranteed under the treaty, and under all the rules of which I can conceive, it would be a domestic question for Japan, and Japan would not permit it to come before the league for settlement. But, back of all that, as the Senator from Florida will realize if he will reflect upon the situation, is the fact that if Japan should not actually participate at the time the question were determined, her influence would certainly be quite equal to that which enabled the Shantung provision to be inserted in the treaty. Japan secured Shantung because of her tremendous power, because of her great prestige, because neither Great Britain nor France nor the United States were willing to go into the league or to form it without Japan. The President has told us in unmistakable terms—and, considering everything, with remarkable candor—that the price of the league was Shantung; that it could not have been formed without it. It could not be maintained without it. If they were willing to wreck the league rather than not to have the Shantung provision put in the treaty, shall we assume that they are willing to stay in the league if we take Shantung from them? If not, the same argument precisely which put Shantung under her control will keep it there. I think I know how China is going to get Shantung back, but that is prophecy, and there is no need to indulge in it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator further?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. One of two things, it seems to me, is inevitable—and I do not speak of my own knowledge so much as the knowledge of those who have studied the question—either the Shantung affair will result in the dismemberment of China and the absorption of the Chinese people or their control and dominancy by Japan, as in the case of Korea; or the other thing will happen; and that is, that the young Chinamen, the students who are thoroughly aroused as they never have been before aroused, will take possession of the situation in China, and the result will be an oriental conflict compared with which, in my judgment, it could no longer be said that the German war was the great war of history.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator yield to me further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not wish to prolong the discussion at all; but the Senator has alluded to what was claimed to be an agreement between China and Japan upon which the final arrangement was based. The Senator may not attach much importance to that agreement, but my understanding is that there was some such agreement.

Mr. BORAH. That agreement has been discussed. Of course, China always claimed that that agreement was obtained by duress, and I think the facts are conclusive upon that point. Furthermore, as I remember the President's statement, following the statement of a distinguished Japanese as to the conditions upon which Shantung was to be returned to China, the President's statement repudiated the proposition that that agreement had anything at all to do with the understanding as to the return of Shantung to China. The Senator will recall that when the statement referred to was made by the distinguished Japanese statesman the President felt under the necessity the next morning of stating that that was not his understanding, and that the agreement or treaty of 1915 had nothing to do with it.

I believe, Mr. President, I shall not further trespass upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope we can now have a vote on the pending question. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the sixth reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is demanded. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Glass	Knox	Poindexter
Borah	Gronna	Lenroot	Ransdell
Brandegee	Hale	Lodge	Sheppard
Capper	Harris	McCormick	Shields
Chamberlain	Henderson	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Colt	Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Moses	Smoot
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Spencer
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sutherland
Edge	Kellogg	Nugent	Townsend
Fletcher	Kendrick	Overman	Trammell
France	Kenyon	Page	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Keyes	Phelan	Wolcott
Gay	King	Phipps
Gerry	Kirby	Pittman

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to the roll call, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to reservation No. 6, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I have agreed to take care of him with a pair during that absence. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and I do so and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. On this question he is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). The occupant of the chair has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], but is at liberty to vote on this question. He votes "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS. I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I understand, however, that if present he would vote as I shall vote on this question, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I have been informed that he would vote the same way that I shall vote on this question, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent; but I am informed that if he were present, he would cast his vote in the affirmative on this question. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea." I ask that this announcement as to my pair and its transfer may stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the affirmative). I announce my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. It is my understanding that if present he would vote as I have voted on this question, and I will therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I voted a moment ago under a misapprehension. I thought the vote was on the main proposition. Anything is better than the main proposition as an amendment, and I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). Observing that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, is absent, I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I understand, however, that if he were present he would likewise vote in the affirmative, so I will let my vote stand.

Mr. HALE. My colleague, the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], is absent on official business of the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], if present, would vote "yea" on this question.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is absent on account of the death of a member of his family.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] are absent in attendance at the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD.

The result was announced—yeas 69, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—69.

So Mr. LODGE's amendment to reservation No. 6 was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I offer the substitute which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to substitute for reservation No. 6 the following:

That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty, the United States understands that the German rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a question has arisen here as to whether or not the representatives of Japan, as an inducement to secure the assent of the President to these three articles of the treaty, promised the return of these German rights to China. I was surprised when any question was made as to that fact; and I desire to read an extract from a speech delivered by the President of the United States, in which he refers to this promise which the Japanese Government has made. I want to say, in addition, that these promises to which the President refers as having been made in Paris are by no means the only promises. Other definite promises made in Tokyo by the Japanese Government, and other public statements made by Japanese representatives in this country, were to the same effect as referred to by the President in this speech in St. Louis.

The President said:

Great Britain, and subsequently France, as everybody now knows, in order to make it more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of the German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should, in the case of the victory of the Allies, pass to Japan. There was no qualification in the promise. She was to get exactly what Germany had, and so the only thing that was possible was to induce Japan to promise—and I want to say in fairness, for it would not be fair if I did not say it, that Japan did very handsomely make the promise which was requested of her—that she would retain in Shantung none of the sovereign rights which Germany had enjoyed there, but would return the sovereignty without qualification to China and retain in Shantung Province only what other nationalities had already had elsewhere, economic rights with regard to the development and administration of the railway and of certain mines which had become attached to the railway. That is her promise, and personally I have not the slightest doubt that she will fulfill that promise. She can not fulfill it right now, because the thing does not go into operation until three months after the treaty is ratified, so that we must not be too impatient about it. But she will fulfill that promise.

Suppose that we said that we would not assent—

And that is exactly what is proposed by the Lodge reservation—

Suppose we said that we would not assent. England and France must assent, and if we are going to get Shantung Province back for China and these gentlemen do not want to engage in foreign wars, how are they going to get it back? Their idea of not getting into trouble seems to be to stand for the largest possible number of unworkable propositions.

It is all very well to talk about standing by China, but how are you standing by China when you withdraw from the only arrangement by which China can be assisted? If you are China's friend, then do not go into the council where you can act as China's friend! If you are China's friend, then put her in a position where even the concessions which have been made need not be carried out! If you are China's friend, scuttle and run! That is not the kind of American I am.

Now, there is a statement by the President of the United States that he holds a promise made by Japan to return the sovereignty rights of Germany in the Shantung Province after the conclusion of peace.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi, who first rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator in his concluding sentence has virtually answered what I was about to ask. I would like to ask him, however, if he has not noticed in the public prints that Japan has already made a proposition to China to open negotiations for the purpose of returning the Shantung-German rights to China, and that China, under some influence or other—I do not know what, but probably proceeding directly in accordance with the views of the United States Senate—refuses to negotiate at all?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true. Japan initiated at once negotiations with China for the return of the rights of sovereignty which it has been complained Japan is exercising in the Shantung Province. As yet China has not even assented to the negotiations. Possibly it desired in some way to keep this issue alive.

But one thing is certain: If we want to aid China to secure back the rights of sovereignty in the Shantung Province, the thing to do is to put ourselves in a position to hold Japan to the promises made to the President as an inducement to get him to assent. We can not withdraw our assent and at the same time hold Japan to her promises. Those promises were given for the purpose of securing our assent, and if we refuse our assent, we are in no position to hold Japan to her promises; and we are not in a very good position to hold Japan to her promises unless we go into the League of Nations, which will be the tribunal where the rights of China can be asserted and protected.

Mr. President, I have seen a good many crocodile tears shed here in behalf of China, but some of the very Senators who shed those tears were in public life at the time Germany, in 1898, secured these rights in the Shantung Province, and no American voice was raised in protest against Germany securing those rights from China at that time. Our then existing Government assented to it, and I have already read into the RECORD the official communications from the State Department assenting to the change that was made when Germany secured her 99 years' lease in the Shantung Province.

Mr. President, what Germany secured in 1898 she held for 20 years, and there was no protest from the United States. All this treaty does is to transfer from Germany to Japan the rights which Germany had secured with the assent of the whole world; and what the President of the United States did was to secure from Japan the very definite and positive promise that Japan would turn those rights of sovereignty back to the Chinese Government after the conclusion of the war and the signing of a treaty of peace.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield first to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator to say that he had previously mentioned the fact that our State Department—and, of course, that carries with it the presidential administration at that time—assented to Germany taking charge of Shantung under the German-Chinese treaty of 1898. I do not think the Senator has fully enough expressed that. We not only assented, but our Department of State congratulated the Kaiser upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is absolutely true. I have read that communication into the RECORD. There are the very Senators now in public life who were in public life then, and there was no word of protest. Germany took that from China by force, practically. It had the dignity of a treaty, but it was practically exacted as an unjust penalty from China by force, and Germany held it for 20 years, and you did not begin to shed your crocodile tears until 20 years had elapsed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from Nebraska mean to say that our State Department congratulated Germany upon obtaining the lease from China?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I read into the RECORD a statement from Mr. Secretary Hay to the secretary of state for foreign affairs in Germany congratulating Germany upon the policy she had adopted in her newly acquired Shantung Province.

Mr. LENROOT. Ah! The Senator well knows that the congratulation was upon making an open port, a free port, within that territory and had nothing to do with the lease itself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asserting that the United States practically assented to the transfer, and so did every nation in the world. It was Germany's for 20 years, and Japan did not take it from China. Japan took it from Germany and holds it by right of conquest, and yet Senators stand here and prate about the President of the United States having assented to the rape of China by Japan. Mr. President, I do become indignant when I hear statements of that sort.

China has not had it for 20 years and more, and the only hope that China has of getting it again is the promise the President of the United States exacted from Japan. You propose to do nothing toward restoring it to China except to make political capital out of it here in the Senate against the President of the United States, who really made an effort. You know just as well as I know that Japan seized this property in the war before we got into it. Japan had possession of it long before we even declared war against Germany, when we were in the attitude of a neutral, and Japan has held it ever since, and will continue to hold it; and you who shed your crocodile tears will not even go into a League of Nations, where it might be possible to try the claims of China, backed by the promise which the President wrung from Japan as a condition of giving his assent to what had already happened.

Oh, you will withhold your assent, will you? What good will that do China when Japan is in possession? Japan is in possession with the assent of Great Britain, with the assent of France, with the assent of Italy, with the assent of every other nation in the world, and you do not propose to do anything for China. All you propose to do is to endeavor to make a little capital and injure the President of the United States, who did what he could by exacting this promise from Japan.

So I propose, as a substitute for this empty, meaningless thing, a declaration that the Senate agrees to the ratification of the treaty with the understanding and upon the condition that Japan is to return to China the rights of sovereignty in the Shantung Province in accordance with the promises that the President exacted from her.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word. The Senator from Nebraska says that the President did what he could in this Shantung matter. The President had the same opportunity to do in the Shantung matter what he has now done in the Adriatic matter, but in the Shantung matter, for some reason, he did not avail himself of the opportunity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator from Nebraska leaves the Chamber I should like to ask him whether he bases his reservation upon the President's statement which the Senator has read to the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; in part. The President made a public statement more definite and more elaborate than this one, but I have not been able to place my hand upon it. The testimony before the Committee on Foreign Relations also was to the same effect.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator whether President Wilson ever anywhere has stated that the representatives of the Japanese Government have made any promise other than that to restore the sovereign rights in Shantung?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not that I know of.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but the Senator's reservation would imply an understanding that all rights are to be restored.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Whatever rights the promise covers.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, where does the Senator get that understanding, when the President makes no claim that there was any such understanding?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There have been other statements made—statements made, as I said, in Tokyo; statements made by distinguished statesmen of Japan on many occasions—and actually at the present time Japan has endeavored to negotiate proceedings with China for the return of the sovereign rights. I have not any doubt that Japan, if she is not kept to her promise, is going to hold all she can get in Shantung. I do not disparage the statement that Japan still has the idea of gaining a hold or increasing her hold on the Asiatic coast, and I say the only hope of China is in the promises which have been exacted, and it is no use for Senators to say that those promises amount to nothing. They are all you have, and they are a great deal more than this hollow mockery of a reservation that does not do China any good.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask the Senator if Japan does carry out the promise that President Wilson says was made at Paris, will she not then have fully fulfilled her undertaking as a condition of the peace treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; and, moreover, she will have done the thing that you most complain against. You have been talking about her exercise of sovereign rights. You have not been complaining about her use of the economic opportunities that other nations enjoy in China, as in the operation of railroads. You have been complaining that she was endeavoring to make a political annexation of Shantung and subject the Chinese people of the Shantung Province to her domination and control. Those powers she has promised to abdicate in favor of China, and they are the important thing.

Mr. LENROOT. My point is that the Senator presents to the Senate a reservation expressing an understanding that he knows was never made. No promise was made at Paris; and he now admits that there is no expectation that Japan will do what the Senator's reservation says we understand Japan will do. That is the trouble. His reservation is not fair; it expresses something that he knows it is not intended, and President Wilson does not expect Japan to keep.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have never been able to draw a reservation or anything else that suited the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a moment ago the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] stated that he did not understand why the President of the United States had not done in connection with the Shantung-Japanese provision precisely what he did in connection with Fiume. Of course the Senator from Wisconsin knows better than that. He knows that the two cases are not analogous. He knows, or ought to know, that the conditions which existed at the time Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan entered into the Shantung arrangement were never later changed. He also knows, or ought to know, on what the provisions of the secret treaty of London affecting the Adriatic coast and the town of Fiume were based. By the way, it did not affect the town of Fiume at all; it was not even included in it; and that was an afterthought of Italy; Italy claimed it later on. He, of course, knows that that treay was based upon the then existing power of the autocracy of Austria-Hungary, and he knows that when Austria-Hungary was dismembered and divided and Jugo-Slavia and Czechoslovakia and Poland taken away from it the danger against which Italy was providing in the secret treaty of London ceased to exist.

Now, that is not all. Senators come here and they raise their voices most stentoriously against the recognition of a secret treaty between certain powers in Europe with regard to Shantung, and so far as these Senators are concerned, if they follow their leader, they are nevertheless attempting to execute another secret treaty, to wit, that of London, and are advocating turning over Fiume to Italy even outside of the treaty and beyond it.

Of course, the Senator knows, he must know, that conditions in the east remained exactly as they were when the secret treaty was entered into, and that conditions along the Adriatic changed completely. The President had no right to say to three or four sovereign powers, equally sovereign with us, that they must absolutely set aside a treaty, especially is this true when we remember we entered into the war for the maintenance of treaties and against the idea that they could be scraps of paper.

But the President had a right when he came to the Adriatic question to say "those conditions have totally changed; the safeguard from military menace that Italy wanted on the Adriatic has ceased to be necessary, because the great autocratic Empire of Austria-Hungary has been dissolved and has ceased to exist; the very conditions intended to be safeguarded have become revolutionized; they have become the very opposite of what they were. Now, the important question is to give entrance to the Adriatic to Jugo-Slavia, and moreover Italy is safe from the Austro-Hungarian Empire because by the fortunes of war we have absolutely dismembered and destroyed it."

Now, Mr. President, one more little thing. It seems to me that the Senators who have been bewailing about China most are the men who hitherto have not been the friends of Chinamen in the United States. It seems to me, moreover, that Senators forget the condition of the Orient when they are trying to bring about a condition of things which will insure everlasting peace and harmony of purpose and accord of action between Japan and China. That is the last thing in the world the white race wants. If ever there is complete accord between Japan and China and between the Japanese intellect and trained Chinese man power, the white race might just as well retire voluntarily from the theater of the world's action. Four hundred millions of Chinese, as brave as you or I, more contemptuous of death than you or I, needing only military discipline, of which they are capable, as Chinese Gordon proved; Japan is anxious to give it. The future peace of the world is threatened by a possible alliance between Japan, Germany, and Russia, the three together controlling and exploiting China—that is what is before you. Let sleeping dogs sleep; do not wake them up.

There is a long horoscope that I am afraid a lot of you do not catch. There is a great danger to the future peace and civilization of the world from an alliance between Germany, Russia, and Japan, controlling China, and the three together would necessarily control China, because you yourself would not vote to-morrow for an appropriation to send an American army there to prevent the result of that sort of an alliance, if it ever existed, from controlling China. That is one of the great dangers to the future peace of the world that somehow must be met, either by rehabilitating Germany and giving her a chance to pay her debts so that the balance of the world may pay its debts, or else by rehabilitating Russia so as to make her independent of the possible economic interpenetration of Germany. One of those two things must take place, and if one does not take place, the other becomes a necessity of history in the future, and you and I will have to face it.

One of the luckiest things that ever happened in the world was that the czardom went to pieces and that Russia was not present around the council board in Paris when conditions of peace had to be agreed to. If the old Empire of Russia, with all its power and pride as represented by the czardom had been there, the President not only would not have been able to do anything with regard to Shantung or the Adriatic, but he would not have been able to do anything with regard to anything else at all. Russian autocratic barbarism would have dominated the council at Versailles just as, after the Napoleonic wars, under Alexander it dominated the council at Vienna.

Luckily for the world Russia went to pieces. Luckily she could not be represented at the peace conference at Versailles. Luckily autocratic, semibarbaric ideas could not be presented. Luckily Constantinople was not handed over to Russia to give Russia an open path into the Mediterranean and thence into the Atlantic in order that her hordes might at some time in the future overpower Aryan civilization with pan-Slavonic semibarbarism. Man proposes and God disposes. I think in this case God did a great deal of the disposing.

But there remains Russia, with over a hundred million people; there remain the Teutonic stock of Germans, whom you can not destroy from the face of the earth—70,000,000 of them. All that you can say and all that you can do will not remove these stumblingblocks in the way of the world's peace and its civilization. Now, you want to go out and make an enemy of the chief oriental power, as well as of Russia and of Germany, so that at some time there may be possibly, if not probably, an alliance between your present arch enemy, Germany, and the Russians, who at this moment hate you more than they hate anybody else, and the Japanese, whom you are every morning and every evening and every hour between the morning and the evening insulting to the best of your senatorial ability of expression. Now, why do you want to do it?

Japan has positively promised that she will assert no right of sovereignty in Shantung. She has demanded four things, at least three of which all of us want—an open door to foreign trade, a place for foreigners, a free port for all foreigners—and then she has demanded something else for herself in the shape of a Japanese entrepôt in the harbor of the bay at Shantung. Is that more than England has in Hongkong? Is it more than France has in Indo-China? Is that more than we have at Shanghai? Is that less than we want? I thought we were all seeking an "open door" in China for the trade of the white race with the oriental population. If that has not been our chief object, then I have been deceived about what our chief object has been.

Oh, such friends to China as a great many people are, some of them men who, upon my word of honor, I would bet a hundred dollars to one dollar did not know that Shantung was in existence, unless they happened to remember it from their school days, until this war took place. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is exactly right. If you want to help China against Japan, say so. How shall you say so? By saying that we understand that Japan has made certain promises, and that we hold her to them. Can you help China by simply "standing out from under"? You know you can not. If Japan raised an army of a million men to-morrow to make war upon China, you know that not one of you would vote for an appropriation of even $1,000,000 to withstand or resist her. I dare one of you to say you would. You know you would not. So you want to "thunder in the index," making much noise, with little intent of action. If you mean anything, say what the Senator from Nebraska says, which is virtually that Japan has made certain promises, and in agreeing to this particular provision of the treaty we want it understood that we hold her to those promises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the sixth reservation reported by the committee.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. CURTIS called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the yeas and nays are taken, I ask leave to modify my substitute in the hope that I may possibly get the vote of the Senator from Wisconsin. On what appears to be line 22 of the particular print I hold in my hand, I desire to change the word "German" to "sovereign," and on line 24, after the word "treaty," to insert "or now exercised by Japan," so that it will read:

That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the sovereign rights and interests, renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, or now exercised by Japan, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that as modified the amendment means absolutely nothing. Germany never claimed any sovereign rights in Shantung.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, that would be the virtue of the reservation, a virtue which so many of them have.

Mr. BORAH. Germany had a leasehold of Shantung, but never claimed sovereign rights.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho and others upon the other side of the aisle have certainly sought to make a great deal of political thunder out of the fact that Japan is now exercising sovereign rights in Shantung, and it has been claimed that one of the vices of this transfer is that it puts Japan in a position where she can exercise sovereign rights. Now, I have so modified the amendment at least that until Japan relinquishes those sovereign rights to China our adherence to the treaty——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may ask to have the Senator's amendment read from the desk as modified, I think he himself will see that he does not provide for anything, if I understood the reading correctly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska as modified.

The reading clerk read as follows:

That in advising and consenting to the ratification of the said treaty the United States understands that the sovereign rights and interests, renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, or now exercised by Japan, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty.

Mr. BORAH. All that that provides is that the sovereign rights claimed by Germany shall be transferred to China.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; Mr. President, that is not all.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment not only does not mean anything but it ratifies the treaty with a certain understanding. Suppose that understanding is not carried out, the ratification will not be affected. If the senior Senator from Nebraska desires to accomplish what I take it he wants us to believe he is trying to accomplish he will modify the amendment so that it will provide that we withhold our ratification of the treaty until Japan complies with her agreement; but, even if all he claims is true, it does not affect the ratification and it does not require anything from Japan.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think I was correct in my construction of the amendment. It provides:

That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty, the United States understands that the sovereign rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, and now exercised——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no; Mr. President, not "and" but "or"— sovereign rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan * * * or now exercised by Japan.

Any sovereign rights which Japan is exercising. There is all the difference in the world between "and" and "or."

Mr. BORAH. When we get through with the first part we will take the second part.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is where the "snapper" comes in.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; we will take the "snapper."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; take the snapper. The language is "or exercised by Japan," meaning any sovereign rights now exercised by Japan.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Japan has always been ready, as I understand, to return what she calls the sovereign rights, but the economic rights, the railroad franchises, the mines and mining interests, and the things which enable her to absolutely control the destiny of Shantung, Japan has never promised to return.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is it possible that the Senator from Idaho now abandons the very strong ground that he and others have been taking, that Japan was proposing to annex Shantung; in fact, had annexed Shantung, and was exercising sovereign powers of government in Shantung? Is it possible that he now forgets that the very gravamen of the charge against Japan has been the exercise of sovereign rights, rights of government?

Mr. BORAH. No. That is not quite correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The charge has not been that she is running a railroad or operating mines.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, sir. The charge has been that she is oppressing the people by the exercise of political power. That has been the gravamen of the charge always. It is political domination that has been complained of.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho is entirely familiar with the charges which he has made, and he is not digressing from those charges. I know, as ex-Senator Burton so well says, that so long as the economic rights which Japan claims and which she proposes at no time to return are permitted to remain in her possession and under her management the sovereign rights which are spoken of are a mere shell; they amount to nothing. For instance, when Japan takes possession of the mines and is working the mines, while the political sovereignty over that particular region of country may be nominally in China, Japan is really in possession of the country and is in control of it in every way.

If the Senator from Nebraska will do one of two things, I will be glad to support his proposal. If the Senator, first, will make it not a substitute but an amendment, so as to provide that we withhold our assent to article 157 and also construe our understanding of what is to be done by Japan, I will be very glad to support it; I do not care whether it says as much as I want it to say or not. Certainly, if the Senator does not wish to do that, but wishes to have a substitute adopted, if he will provide that we withhold our assent to the treaty until Japan does retransfer her alleged sovereign rights and her economic rights, I will vote for it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no doubt that would be very satisfactory to a "bitter-ender," but I am not a "bitter-ender."

Mr. BORAH. I am sorry to hear that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator is evidently very anxious to help China. He is not even satisfied with having China get back her political sovereignty.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; because it is a shell.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He wants her also to get back the rights to the mines and the privilege of operating the railroads which many foreign nations have. Will he point out somewhere in the reservation which he is supporting any step taken to recover those rights for China?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator had listened to the remarks which I made about an hour ago, he would have heard me say that the reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts does not accomplish all the Senator from Idaho desires. What the Senator from Idaho desired in the beginning was to eliminate from the treaty entirely the Shantung provision and complete the task which is undoubtedly resting upon us in a way that we would be proud of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator would like to eliminate the rest of the treaty also.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I have not conceded that fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Idaho seems to wish that Japan should surrender the railroad and mining rights under the concession which were granted by the Chinese Government to the Germans and afterwards, as the result of this treaty, were transferred to Japan. The Senator has insisted upon a surrender by Japan of all railroad and mining concessions in China; but would he at the same time insist that all other nations shall surrender their concessions of like character?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the question should come here so that the Senate would be called to act upon it as a treaty, involving a confirmation of the rights of Great Britain and France in China, I would never vote to ratify it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And America; do not forget we have some concessions.

Mr. BORAH. America stands upon an entirely different footing. But I would never in the world vote to ratify such a treaty. Now, let me say to the Senator that I think Japan is perfectly justified in what she did with reference to Shantung by the precedents which had been set by Great Britain and by France.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And by Italy.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Italy did not do so well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Like in kind, though different in degree.

Mr. BORAH. Italy started in, but Great Britain and France were not sure that they had all they wanted, and they objected. The manner in which France secured her rights and the manner in which Great Britain secured her rights are perfectly parallel, to the manner in which Japan secured hers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And to the manner in which Germany secured hers before they were transferred to Japan.

Mr. BORAH. Germany secured a leasehold, which was less of a right than that which Great Britain and France secured. There is no justification for the manner in which France and Great Britain or Japan or Germany secured their rights in China.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that I agree absolutely with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will bring that question before the Senate in such a way that the Senator from Idaho can act upon it, I will do the same with reference to those two countries that I am seeking to do with reference to Japan. I want China let alone. She is a great nation; I want her to work out her own destiny; I want to take the grip of France, Great Britain, and Japan off the throat of China, and I am perfectly willing to vote along those lines any time I have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. President, the fact remains that the Senator can not take off the grip of the other nations of the the civilized world from China, and now he is trying to take off the grip of only one of the great nations, and confesses that he is powerless to take off the grip of the others. I agree with the Senator that there has been by nearly every great nation in the world some degree of coercion upon China under the guise of treaties. Some of the treaties with China remind me of treaties that the United States Government used to make with the Indians, when it would call them up, lay the treaty before them, and tell them to sign it. That is about what has been done with China for a long time.

Mr. BORAH. That is what we are about doing to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We first started the game in Japan by forcing Japan to open her ports to American commerce under the guns of our Navy. Now, the Senator says he would like to see China left alone. I do not know that I can go that far. I am rather inclined to think that the interpenetration of the civilized white races of the world has done China no harm, and will do her a great deal of good; but I have the same opinion that he has as to the manner in which the interpenetration has taken place; it has too frequently been at the mouth of a pistol under the guise of the words of the Prince of Peace, and very frequently it has followed up missionaries who were carrying the gospel of the Prince of Peace to the heathen. I agree with the Senator about that; but the point still remains that when the Senator insists upon what he is doing here he is insisting upon a discrimination against Japan in her dealings with China as compared with the dealings of all the other chief races of the world with China. That is the effect, whether or not that is his intent.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho is confronted with the proposition of the Japanese; he is not confronted with the proposition of Great Britain or France. I do not hesitate to express my opinion of the activities of those two Governments in China, but I can only vote on the question which is before me, and that is the Japanese proposition. I would gladly express myself through the treaty-making power if I could with reference to the activities of France and Great Britain in China, but I can not do so. The other question is before us, and must I connive at the program, proceed with it to a further consummation than it has already proceeded, and become a party to it myself? That I do not propose to do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see the Senator's point, but the point does not go very well when one remembers that under the League of Nations all this matter may be brought in. The Senator might also insist that France and Great Britain and Italy and the United States—not as a government, but as a great many of our people have concessions there, mines, and so forth, and we are standing behind them—ought also to retire from China. Now, while I do not want us to retire from China, because I do not think it would be in the interest of the Chinese people that we should, I should like to see every foot of Chinese territory that has been taken by force or under a bludgeon or in front of a pistol restored to China; but the Senator can not do it, and I can not do it. Now, when he is faced with that status, why he should insist upon making an exception of Japan I can not understand.

Mr. BORAH. Japan makes the exception by coming here and asking the United States to do what Great Britain and France never asked her to do, and that is to ratify her wrong.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In the reservation which the Senator is supporting nothing is done to assist China in getting back either her sovereign rights in Shantung or her economic interests. Am I right there?

Mr. BORAH. I think the only thing that is done is to exert a mere moral influence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but in this reservation which I have presented as a substitute, the Senator certainly will admit that if we adhere to it upon this condition, our adherence would only be made good in case Japan abdicates in favor of China all of the sovereign powers which she is now exercising. Am I not right?

Mr. BORAH. I am not so sure about that. I should like to look at it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to make that point clear—that in the one case we do absolutely nothing for China, either in the direction of securing back her economic rights or her sovereign rights; and while the reservation which I present may be criticized for not insisting that the economic rights shall be returned, it certainly goes to the extent of stating, as a condition upon which the United States ratifies this treaty, that Japan shall return the sovereign rights.

Mr. BORAH. No; that is the difficulty with the Senator's amendment. The Senator's amendment simply says—

That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. That is all. We simply understand it in a certain way. Japan may understand it differently.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator please read the rest of it?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I will:

The United States understands that the sovereign rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions—of said treaty are to be returned.

And so forth, naming them—

We understand that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We understand that. Now, suppose Japan accepts our ratification with that understanding. We have her promise, and we have the League of Nations in which to maintain it.

Mr. BORAH. Please leave out the last.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Out of deference to the Senator, I will forget the League of Nations.

Mr. BORAH. All right; I wish the Senator would.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But we will be in the position of having laid it down as a condition that Japan shall abdicate her sovereign rights in favor of China, and Japan accepts our understanding of the treaty when she permits us to ratify it with that understanding, and that becomes a contract between the United States and Japan. Now, has not China gained something by that, and what does China gain by the reservation the Senator is supporting?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think China gains anything by this unless Japan is of a mind to go ahead upon her own motion and carry it out. There is no condition. In other words, if Japan fails to carry it out, there is no provision in the amendment to the effect that we shall be considered as being released from the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; but, Mr. President, I repeat the question to the Senator: We make a reservation to the treaty. We deposit that reservation, and by its terms provide that Japan assents to it by failing to make a refusal to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, assuming that Japan has assented to our reservation, she has accepted our understanding; she has approved the interpretation which we have placed on the understanding. Is not Japan bound, as by a treaty, to do the thing which she accepts us as having stipulated?

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator a question. He says Japan assents to it. If the Senator from Idaho should conclude to vote for this amendment—and in choosing between two matters, both of which are unsatisfactory, I might very easily choose either—if the Senator from Idaho should choose to support this amendment, would the Senator from Nebraska support a resolution of ratification which would impose upon Japan the necessity of affirmatively accepting the terms of these reservations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in one respect the Senator from Nebraska is like the Senator from Idaho. He does not expect to vote for the resolution of ratification unless it contains some other things and unless some other things are eliminated from it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has said that Japan consents to this matter by remaining silent. Let me say here, Mr. President, that I do not accept that as of any worth whatever. To me it is utterly idle to talk about one nation invoking the law of estoppel against another nation. If we say to Japan, "We have put certain reservations in here, and if you remain silent when the President deposits them we will consider you to have accepted them," to my mind it is an utter nullity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, of course there is no tribunal, no court, that could enforce that upon Japan; but, taken in connection with the fact that Japan has made the promise stated by the President and that we have recited the condition in our ratification, if Japan permits the ratification to go into effect by her silence, does not the Senator think Japan would be in a position before all the world of having consented to that condition which we have imposed?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think she would be in any different position than she is now, because she has already given her word, according to the Senator. I think the Senator is mistaken as to what she has said, but if the Senator is correct as to her promise she would not be in any different position under this amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think she would not only have made the original promise, but she would be in the attitude of seeing that we had accepted it, and of having assented to our acceptance of it.

Mr. BORAH. Why is not the Senator willing that this shall be attached to the reservation as an amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not willing to do so because I think Japan can not be held unless we put it in some form like this. I think that where Japan has made a statement we have the right to accept that statement, and tell her that we have accepted it, and put it in the document of ratification, and I believe then that Japan will make good on her promise; and I ask the Senator again, What is there in the reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts that exacts anything of Japan, that does anything toward China recovering her sovereignty or anything else in the Shantung Province? Nothing at all.

Mr. BORAH. The United States withholds her assent to these particular sections and disapproves them. The moral influence of that, Chinamen think, will be very great. I think it will be very little.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator that it will be very little. In other words, it amounts to just this: We behold Great Britain and France and Italy and the other nations assenting to the transfer of Germany's interest in Shantung to Japan, and those countries have no promises from Japan, and we stand back and wash our hands of the matter and say that we will have nothing to do with the transaction. We are submitting to the rape of China; we are making no effort to protect China; whereas my reservation accepts the promises that Japan has made, and proposes to hold her to them. I think that is something substantial, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. If I thought this accomplished anything like what the Senator seems to think it accomplishes, I might view the matter in a different light than I do; but when you simply say that the United States understands that these sovereign rights are to be returned you express what the United States understands, and it does not bind Japan at all unless Japan affirmatively accepts it as her understanding of the treaty. The Senator is not willing to have that affirmative acceptance expressed through the usual diplomatic channels by Japan. He wants Japan to be bound merely by her silence, which, in my judgment, amounts to nothing. It does not change it at all.

If the Senator, in writing this understanding into the treaty, will then follow it by a reservation which will make it necessary for Japan affirmatively to accept and declare this to be also her understanding, then we will have arrived somewhere; but that is not the program now. The program now is to have the ratification based upon silence, simply if the other nations do not object within a certain time. To my mind that is utterly worthless. I regard that as of no moment whatever. You can not invoke the law of silence as a principle of estoppel against a sovereignty, and that is what they are attempting to do by this and the amendment to the preamble; and if this should go into the treaty, and the preamble as it is proposed to be changed should be changed, this would not amount to anything. In my judgment, it would be simply our understanding, and Japan does not consent to it at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that this alleged understanding does not and can not arise out of any of the terms of the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. It arises out of a mere voluntary declaration upon our part, without any assent upon the part of Japan that it is her understanding also.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is as anxious to help Japan as he would have us believe he is, I think I can suggest a change in his substitute that will do some good. As it is, I believe it is a sham. It gives less to China than the pending reservation, and that means mighty little. He has now branched out as a friend of China, and the crocodile tears are not coming from this side. In order that the crocodile tears that he is shedding so profusely may have some effect and do some good, I should like to have him modify his substitute so as to make the ratification of the treaty on our part depend upon Japan turning over to China the sovereign and economic rights which she possesses there, and which she obtained by driving Germany out; and if he will do that, I shall be delighted to support the proposition.

My colleague's substitute simply says:

That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the sovereign rights and interests—

Now, that means the sovereign rights and the sovereign interests—

renounced by Germany—

I want to pause there to let the Senate understand just what that means—the sovereign rights and interests—

The word "sovereign" modifies "interests" as well as it does "rights," so that there is nothing there except what is sovereign—

the sovereign rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, or now exercised by Japan, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty.

Mr. President, this illustration was given a while ago: Suppose that in this treaty we still retained the sovereign rights over Pennsylvania, but we had given to England or Japan the Pennsylvania Railroad and all the mines in Pennsylvania, and with them, of course, the right to protect the mines, to operate them, and to operate the railroad. Would there be very much left?

Take it in connection with Japan's history, as she has grasped little by little, year after year, the nation of Korea. The first thing that would happen would be that she would send there an army to protect the railroad and an army to protect the mines. She would pronounce laws and edicts that would make it impossible for a Chinaman to live there. Already in Shantung she is charging Chinamen a toll for crossing the railroad—a railroad built by the toil of Chinese. In order to go from one side to the other, on Chinese soil, they pay a toll. She is not claiming the sovereignty!

Mr. President, she will claim and she will obtain the sovereignty and everything else, as everybody knows, before she gets through. It is the history of those things. There is not an exception in the history of the world. It makes it impossible for the Chinese to resist any further encroachments that may be made.

Instead of saying "in advising and consenting," if my colleague will say "the United States withholds its ratification of the treaty until Japan turns over to China all rights of every kind that she obtained through her conquest and through her driving Germany out of China," then we will have a reservation that will amount to something. Then my colleague will be repaid for the bitter crocodile tears that he is shedding in behalf of poor China. It will accomplish something if we can get that.

Mr. President, we hear Senators even defending a crime on the part of Japan because in the years that have passed a crime has been committed by Great Britain and France. Is it any defense that because England has some concessions in China that she obtained wrongfully therefore we must give Japan some concessions that she obtained wrongfully? If the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is charged with stealing my horse, it on that theory would be a good defense for him to prove that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] had the day before stolen another one of my horses.

Mr. REED. May I inquire if the Senator from Nebraska has two horses?

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator, if he has two horses, does he ever ride them both at the same time going in opposite directions? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not a Democrat. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce to occupants of the galleries that it is a violation of the rule of the Senate to manifest approval or disapproval of any remarks made on the floor of the Senate, and the Chair will enforce that rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was asked whether I had two horses. Since the stealing of horses has been mentioned, I do not think I had better state in this company how many horses I have or where they are. [Laughter.] So I decline to answer.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator said he is not a Democrat, but I believe he will not deny that he is an irreconcilable, and they have pursued more different courses in relation to this treaty than anybody else I know of.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is an honor on the matter of this treaty to be an irreconcilable. It is a badge of honor, as I look at it.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; if it is not about a horse.

Mr. WATSON. No. What will be the relationship existing between Japan and Shantung on the League of Nations; that is to say, in what respect will that relationship be changed from what it is now?

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. Those who are in favor of the treaty always come back and say, "Let us get the League of Nations, and then we will settle these matters." Mr. President, several of the great powers before the League of Nations agreed to divide up the world. England, France, and Japan reach out to get everything that is loose and has not been nailed down and that belongs to a weak country; and then they want to get the League of Nations. They do that in advance of the League of Nations, because they know that under this treaty and under the league that is in the treaty we guarantee their title. To my mind it is perfectly foolish to say that we will sign an agreement that, for instance, gives the world acknowledgment of the right of Japan to rule forever over Korea, and then after we have signed it expect Japan to give it up. There is no means provided, and you could not provide for a provision, by which anyone could initiate an action, for instance, to take Ireland away from England after we agree to this treaty. Is there any place where Ireland could go in this league and set up a plea that she ought to be freed from the control of Great Britain? Is there any machinery provided in the league by which Korea or Shantung could do that in reference to Japan? No, Mr. President, the reverse is true. The approval of this treaty puts the nail into every one of these coffins and drives it down and clinches it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. President Wilson said that during the progress of the council at Versailles whenever the question was approached touching the relationship of Japan to Shantung immediately Lloyd-George and Clemenceau withdrew to the other end of the room and permitted him to fight it out alone with the Japanese representatives. Of course, the reason for that is manifest. It was because they had a secret treaty and had had for many months with Japan by which Japan was to retain her hold on Shantung and by which England was to have all the islands in the Pacific Ocean south of the Equator, and other great territorial possessions were conceded to France and some to Italy. While they had their share of the swag it was very natural that they could not very well object to another nation holding her share of the swag, and therefore they declined to have anything to do with the conference touching Shantung. How will that relationship be changed after the League of Nations is formed?

Mr. NORRIS. It will not be changed.

Mr. WATSON. England still has what she got under the terms of that treaty; France still has what she got under the terms of the treaty; and very naturally they can not object to Japan holding what she got under the terms of the treaty while they themselves are holding stolen property.

Mr. NORRIS. In addition to what the Senator has said, when that time comes, if we approve this treaty as it stands now, we will do the same as England and the same as Japan. We will have approved it. When we approve the treaty we approve all those steals, we approve officially all those outrages. We will be estopped as well as those who have the swag and have a double interest in preventing any weak nation from getting its rights or its freedom after it has been taken over and the seal of approval placed upon the transaction by this treaty and this league.

Mr. WATSON. If this covenant were adopted as the President brought it back, we would not only approve it, but we would pledge to the world that we will furnish men and money to see that the status is maintained for all time to come.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, it is our contract as well as everybody's else, and we are in honor bound to stand by it. Now, it is said that because somebody else robbed Shantung everybody else has a right to rob her. Mr. President, I presume you will admit that no protest was made and we did not go to war when England took over a part of China and France took over a part of China and got rights that they never ought to have had; got them in reality by force in the same way that Japan got them. Some of the most disgraceful pages of history, it seems to me, are connected with the way England got her rights in China. We did not protest, we did not go to war, that is true; we did not shed any crocodile tears, but it never was before us for action. It may not be to our credit, but there is some difference in knowing that your neighbor has been robbed and not taking any steps to arrest the criminal, and a condition where you go in with the criminal and help to do the robbing. There is a difference in degree.

We are going to help commit the sin when we approve this document. We are not an innocent bystander now in this matter. It is up to us, and we must vote officially. We must act as a part of the great Government of the United States, and give our official approval to this instrument before it is binding as against the United States. That is vastly different from a case that may be outrageous and may be wrong, but with which we have had no connection. It does not follow that because you refuse to commit a wrong against your neighbor you will always go out of your way when your neighbor has a quarrel with somebody else and you are not in it or a part of it. It may be your duty as a high-class citizen to go to his help when your rights or your liberty are not interfered with. It may be to your dishonor and your disgrace if you do not, but we are not confronted now with that kind of a proposition. We are a part of the necessary operating machinery, and we are asked now to give our official approval to this infamy.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has several times said that we are approving of this action if we agree to the treaty. I know that he means, if he understands the treaty and the covenant the same as I do, that we are not only approving it but we are binding ourselves to defend it; we are pledging our fortunes, our lives, and our sacred honor to defend whatever may come up in all the steals which the Senator has enumerated.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], if the Senator from Nebraska will pardon me, was twitting Members on this side of the aisle for not shedding crocodile tears and calling attention to the wrongful acts at the time Germany wrongfully took these possessions in China. I assume that every Senator here will admit that whatever was done at that time was a diplomatic transaction. The Senate did not have that proposition under consideration. I take it that the people of the United States were as ready and willing to condemn the wrongful action of Germany at that time as they are willing now to condemn the action of Japan in not only taking the property of the people of China, as the Senator has so well said, but placing herself in a position where ultimately she will be in possession of the sovereignty of that nation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has well said that Germany acquired her rights there by means that were not honorable. She secured a treaty, it is true, like the other countries did, but she did it at the point of cannon. Nobody defends it. Nobody stands now in the civilized world anywhere and says that it was right; and yet the Senators who are behind this treaty give that very crime as a reason why we ought to commit another one.

Then there is another thing that they ought to remember. We supposed that we had reached a new day. I supposed, and I think the people of the United States did, that we had reached a time when we were going to turn over a new leaf, as it were, when civilization was going to do what was right, open and aboveboard, "open covenants openly arrived at," the abolishment of secret compacts, the nonrecognition of secret treaties, a pledge that we would not take possession of another country and annex it without the consent of the people of that country. These other things happened in the old days, before the days of Woodrow Wilson and his 14 points. Now we are living in a new age, and yet you are going to commit crimes and permit crimes and condone crimes based on the precedents established in the old days of barbarism before we turned over the new leaf.

Mr. President, personally I care very little about this reservation. In my judgment the so-called Lodge reservation will have nothing but a moral effect and I support it on that ground. It may do a great deal more good than I think it will. Sometimes a step taken like that by a great nation does have a great effect upon history. It may be a shining light along the pathway of nations by which they will point to the proposition that the great American Government refused to put its official stamp on such a damnable and accursed international crime as was committed on China. In that way it may do some good; I hope it will. At least it is better than nothing. In my judgment we are doing far from our duty. We ought to throw this treaty out of the window until all such things as this are eliminated.

I would be glad to support the substitute if its author would provide that we shall withhold our consent to the treaty until the things that belong to China are returned to China.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the only right under the treaty of 1898 is a leasehold right for 99 years. That would give, under the peculiar status that a tenant government has, a mere right to occupy and to possess such property as may be attached to the territory covered by the lease. Ordinarily a government does not exercise sovereign powers over leasehold property acquired by treaty or negotiation similar to that of 1898. However, Japan, entering under the treaty of 1898, which is in one sense interpreted by those who favor these articles in the treaty as a mere lease, attempts to exercise, and does exercise in fact, all the attributes of sovereignty. The railroad property, the port property, wharves, warehouses, forts, barracks, public buildings designed for the storage of provisions and ammunition, were all erected by Germany following their entry into that territory in 1898 or 1899.

There are vast improvements that returning travelers of recent date speak of in very emphatic terms in Shantung. They were erected by Germany following her acquisition under this so-called lease. On the shore there are forts builded of stone quarried and built into shot-proof walls. They are pierced for heavy ordnance to defend the point against attack from the seaward side. There are forts built inland capable of defense against the heaviest artillery that has ever seen the soil of China. Nothing short of modern German ordnance would pierce their defenses. The railroads, together with the initial point on tidewater and their terminals in the far interior of this peninsula, builded by Germany, with warehouses, depots, and other railway buildings, are erected with a view of permanent occupation.

The police that patrol the railways and public property claimed by Germany in the peninsula are men belonging to the Japanese Reserve Army. They are no more police than a Regular Army soldier is who would be detailed for police service in the city of Washington. It is in pursuance of a preconceived and well-determined plan by Japan that the police, under the guise of protecting their property covered by this lease, shall be drawn from regular army soldiers, and they are governing the property under the guise of protecting it. Ordinarily a government exercises no sovereign power in a mere leasehold, but Japan to-day is exercising all the rights of a sovereign government over Shantung.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator has correctly stated the situation as it is. I think, however, he did not go far enough with regard to the German occupation, for while there is some doubt as to the phraseology of the original German lease as to the exercise of sovereign powers by Germany, there is no doubt that it excluded the exercise of sovereign powers by China over a part of the leasehold estate.

Now, I ask the Senator, believing as he does, and as I do, that Japan is exercising sovereign powers in the Shantung Province, is it not wise for us in preparing this reservation to take her at her word and accept her agreement to abandon the exercise of those sovereign powers and turn them back to China?

Mr. SHERMAN. Neither the lease nor the treaty, if I were to treat them as synonymous, gives to Japan the right to exercise the sovereign powers I have described. The right is given in the treaty of 1898 or 1899 to exercise only such powers as are necessary to preserve and police the property acquired under the treaty. That treaty does not undertake in terms, nor can such authority be necessarily implied from a reading of it, to confer upon Japan the power of general sovereignty and to govern 38,000,000 of people who reside in that peninsula; and that is the power that can not be covered by such an amendment as that offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Illinois has not heard my amendment or he would not speak along the line that he is speaking. Allow me to read the amendment as I have perfected it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have heard the amendment read twice, but I am willing to hear it a third time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My amendment now reads:

> That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States does so with the understanding that the sovereign rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, or now exercised by Japan, are to be returned to China.

Does not that cover the sovereign powers which Japan is exercising, and does not the Senator favor that proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is specious without covering the point that is in controversy. According to the reading of the amendment it is intended to cover the powers—taking them in their reverse order—exercised by Japan or acquired through the renunciation by Germany of her rights in the peninsula. Those are the two points covered, if I have heard, on the third reading, this amendment correctly. The one is the renunciation of the power or the sovereignty conferred by treaty on Germany and conveyed or released by Germany to Japan under this treaty; the other is the power or sovereignty exercised by Japan at this time.

The exercise of the power of sovereignty by Japan is something that is entirely apart from the granted powers in the original treaty of 1898 or the renunciation of those powers by Germany. It is a usurped power, and the Senator seeks to cover that usurped power under this amendment by providing that the power exercised shall not be included within the terms of the three articles, 156, 157, and 158.

Mr. President, there are involved in this question not merely the powers exercised by Japan at this time but the property they own. It does not make any difference what the language of the amendment may be, Japan has succeeded to the property rights. The Senator only anticipated what I wish in a moment to say on that subject. The property rights of Japan have been acquired by succession to the property rights of Germany in the peninsula. It makes no difference what kind of power individually as a tenant or as a sovereignty they exercise over the property; so long as they retain the property they will exercise the power regardless of anything that may be done in treaties or reservations or amendments that we may make, because of the language—and I call particularly the Senator's attention to this language in article 157:

> The movable and immovable property owned by the German State in the territory of Kiaochow, as well as all the rights which Germany might claim in consequence of the works or improvements made or of the expenses incurred by her, directly or indirectly, in connection with this territory, are and remain acquired by Japan.

Whatever powers she exercises, whether as a mere leasehold tenant or as a sovereign, inhere in this property; and so long as she retains the property and polices it, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska avails nothing. Follow that up by article 158, which provides:

> Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty the archives, registers, plans, title deeds, and documents of every kind, wherever they may be, relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial, or other, of the territory of Kiaochow.

So long as Japan holds the title deeds and public archives and other documents relating to this property, so long as she owns the property and polices it, and puts her soldiers in the forts and warehouses and the ports, and sends her navy into the waters adjacent to those shores to hold it, how is the power she is exercising now to be released by such an amendment? It is wholly futile.

The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] reached the substantial part of this controversy when he stated the result of our approving the treaty with articles 156, 157, and 158 in it. There is a marked difference between neutral inaction and active approval. By voting to ratify the treaty with these articles in it we approve the wrong. The wrong perpetrated in 1898—if it be one, as some of us urge—we did not then condemn, because we were not called upon to break the neutrality in Asia and did not do so. There is so marked a distinction between neutrality or the lack of action and active approval expressed in ratifying a treaty in which the action of 1898 is confirmed as to require no argument more than the statement of the conditions.

It is urged here, Mr. President, with considerable pertinacity that because in 1898 we did not protest we are now estopped. I never heard it urged before any tribunal from the time of the congress of Vienna up to the Paris conference, including all of our many disputes upon both shores—the Bering Sea controversy of some years ago, the Geneva arbitration, or at any gathering where international law was discussed—that a nation could be bound in any such way. The doctrine of equitable estoppel never applies to a nation and can not bind a sovereignty. That is all the proposed amendment would do, the idea apparently being that the transaction occurred in 1898 or 1899; we did not protest; and standing by and saying nothing, that thereby we are now bound and must actively and affirmatively approve something that happened then merely because we did not object to it.

Many things have happened in the world's history in comparatively recent years that we have not approved actively nor disapproved actively but in connection with which we have remained simply neutral, with the inaction that follows such a course. The Franco-Prussian War, beginning in 1871, was fought; Alsace and Lorraine were detached from French territory and held by the Kaiser's father until restored to France under the pending treaty, and the Crimean War was fought in 1853. We protested in none of those instances; we said nothing when Alsace and Lorraine were taken by Bismarck under the Paris treaty of 1871; we said nothing as to what occurred in the Crimean War; no protest issued from us. At no time, in South Africa, when Great Britain was prosecuting war against the people of the Transvaal and the interior, did we raise any protest against the extinguishing of the hopes of that population for independence; neither did we complain nor was anything heard from us in 1913, the year before the World War began, when Albania was divided, when the greater part of her territory and her population, of alien religion and of an entirely different faith, were put under the care of Serbia, Greece, and Montenegro. In 1913 that whole country was detached and put under a hostile government, but we never said anything; yet we are not bound by that action to-day. If we are bound by it, the fate of Albania is sealed, and there is nothing more to be said upon that subject.

In 1917, Mr. President, there was matured and established by the British Government a protectorate over Persia. It is well understood that they are making it a defensive border State against the northern boundary of British East India. We have not protested against the Persian protectorate; we have not protested in the case of South Africa; we have protested against none of the world-wide changes which have taken place before or since 1870. Such changes can literally be numbered by the hundreds; but at no place along the line have we protested by any act of ours, through any diplomatic representative, through any resolution of either House. Through no effort of ours have we ever by any means bound ourselves or sought to interfere or to be bound by our mere neutral inaction. This is the first time that I have heard that we can be bound in that way. I attach no importance to that except as a matter of argument; but morally, so far as there is an argument in it, it can not be urged here against the rejection of these three articles.

We are told by eminent authority that the only binding efficacy there is in the League of Nations is a moral obligation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. GORE. The Senator might add to the great array of precedents the invasion of Belgium by Germany in 1914. No one in America approved of that, but there was no formal protest on the part of our Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not in the least, although it violated The Hague convention of 1907, and although in August, 1914, when the invasion of Belgium was begun, we were at least morally bound, if bound in no other way, to preserve Belgium as a neutral State. However, we not only did not protest, but we maintained in respect of that violation the same neutral inaction we have maintained as to many other world events, and because the League of Nations is a mere moral obligation, if it has any efficacy whatever, we had as well say that morally we can not be bound by neutral inaction.

Therefore I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska and shall vote for the original reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska for reservation No. 6 proposed by the committee.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Gerry	Knox	Ransdell
Borah	Glass	Lenroot	Reed
Brandegee	Gore	Lodge	Sheppard
Calder	Gronna	McCormick	Sherman
Capper	Hale	McLean	Shields
Chamberlain	Harris	McNary	Simmons
Colt	Henderson	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Hitchcock	Myers	Spencer
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sutherland
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Thomas
Edge	Kellogg	Overman	Townsend
Elkins	Kendrick	Phelan	Trammell
Fletcher	Keyes	Phipps	Warren
Frelinghuysen	King	Pittman	Watson

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to have read, as one of the reasons why probably we have not interfered in some of these world-wide matters, copies of two telegrams, one in 1916 and the other in 1917, remembering that we declared war in April, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1916.

His imperial majesty the EMPEROR OF GERMANY,
Berlin:

I take pleasure in extending to your majesty cordial greetings on this birthday anniversary, with assurances of my own high regard and good will.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1917.

His imperial majesty WILLIAM II,
German Emperor, Berlin:

Permit me to extend to your majesty the cordial felicitations of the Government of the United States and my own personal greetings on this anniversary.

WOODROW WILSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to reservation No. 6, as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the substitute is voted upon I desire to strike out the word "understands" and insert "with the understanding."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the substitute as it will read with the modification just made.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty, the United States does so with the understanding that the sovereign rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, or now exercised by Japan, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the ratification of this treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, as modified, offered by the Senator from Nebraska to reservation No. 6, as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On the substitute I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Having a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent, I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who appears to be absent, and I am unable to obtain a transfer. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. As he is absent on official business, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Referring to the previous announcement of my pair, I transfer it to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. If present, he would vote "nay." On this question he is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], if present would vote as I intend to vote upon this substitute. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is detained from the Senate by illness. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 41—as follows:

YEAS—27.

Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Trammell
Gay	Kendrick	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	King	Ransdell	Williams
Glass	Kirby	Sheppard	Wolcott
Harris	Myers	Simmons

NAYS—41.

Borah	Gore	McLean	Spencer
Brandegee	Gronna	McNary	Sterling
Calder	Hale	Moses	Sutherland

Fernald	McCumber	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	McKellar	Robinson

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment as modified, in the nature of a substitute for reservation No. 6 as amended, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on reservation No. 6, as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I am informed that if present he would vote on this question the same way that I shall vote, so I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, and being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made before, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). As I have heretofore announced, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. If present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair, if present, would vote in the affirmative upon this reservation, and I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement of my pair and its transfer, and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made upon the last vote with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]; and

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL].

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—48.

Borah	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Sherman
Brandegee	Gore	McLean	Shields
Calder	Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ga.

So reservation No. 6 as amended was agreed to, as follows:

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now move to substitute for reservation No. 7 as it passed the Senate, the language printed on the second page of the reservation, which I will ask the Secretary to read. I move to strike out all the reservation as originally offered and to insert the words on page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed substitute for reservation No. 7.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amendment proposed in the nature of a substitute has precisely the same effect as the original reservation. It is merely stated in a briefer and more condensed form, but is equally effective.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. It seems to me that there is a defect in the substitute as presented by the Senator, and that there is a decided difference in one respect between the original reservation and the proposed substitute.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will point out to me any defect or weakness in the substitute, I will withdraw it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the opening sentence of the original reservation it was stated that—

The Congress of the United States will provide by law for the appointment of the representatives of the United States in the assembly and the council of the League of Nations.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is the way my reservation had it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In the substitute presented here there is no provision of that sort.

Mr. LODGE. There is not. It was drafted, as the Senator knows, by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me that there ought to be assurance given that the Congress will provide by law for such representatives.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. It was, as the Senator from Massachusetts states, not only drafted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] but urged by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object to having Senators represent what I did or what I said. I did not say and do that thing.

Mr. LODGE. I do not wonder that the Senator objects.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object very seriously to misrepresentation of my action upon this floor.

Mr. KNOX and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I merely wanted to observe, without any reference to the controversy as to what transpired between Senators with relation to the formation of this substitute, that I think there is great merit in the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I think it ought distinctly to provide that the Congress of the United States shall by law determine its representatives.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he questions my statement that this proposed substitute was drawn by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and presented to the bipartisan conference as the proposal of the Democratic members of that conference, including the Senator from Nebraska, and accepted by the Republicans?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to say once for all time that I did not accept or bind myself to abide by anything done in that bipartisan conference. I want to say now once for all, and I hope it will not be necessary to say it again, that we all agreed that everything presented and everything passed was to be considered as merely tentative and not to go into effect until everything had been covered, and that when we reached some of the reservations we found an utter inability to come to any agreement.

To this extent, what the Senator from Wisconsin says is true. I did approve of the idea of abbreviating this particular reservation. It seemed to me that in the interest of good English it should be abbreviated. But I do not stand in opposition to the idea that the Congress should by law provide for the duties and powers of the representatives of the United States. I merely asked the Senator from Massachusetts why that should not be included. He stated that it was intended to include in this brief paragraph everything that was in the paragraph above, only in a briefer form. Now, why, if we are in good faith, should it not be stated that the Congress of the United States will provide by law for the representatives upon the various boards and commissions under the treaty? I am not seeking a controversy over this matter. I assumed that the Senator from Massachusetts would like to have this brief compendium of the reservation include anything of material interest which was in the original reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think those first lines were very proper. In fact, I think our original reservation was very good, though no doubt abbreviating it may have improved it. But I took what the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], for whose legal ability I have great respect, had drawn, and what the Democrats in the conference, who were not bound at all, asked for. I observed what they had left out, but our object was to please them, and so we took what they had prepared. I think my original provision was much better.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I yield the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. I have never said that, in my opinion, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] or any member of the bipartisan conference was bound; indeed, I stated this morning on the floor of the Senate expressly to the contrary, but I do say that the Senator from Nebraska and his colleagues did object to the original reservation and they were invited to present to that conference an alternative. The Senator from Montana did present the reservation that the Senator from Massachusetts now offers, and the Senator from Nebraska asked the Republican Members to tentatively accept it, which we did, exactly in the words in which it is now presented.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts is going to amend or withdraw?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. LODGE. As objection has been made on the other side by those who desired it and accepted it, and who now prefer the original wording, I think I might as well withdraw every attempt to improve it and to take it as it stands.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw the proposed substitute?

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the modification or substitute and ask for a vote on the original reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reservation No. 7, as reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if I am in order for the purpose of saying something upon the matter, I renew the offer of the amendment tendered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I merely desire to say that everybody did agree substantially upon the matter to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has now called attention, and the amendment is in effect exactly the same as that for which it is offered as a substitute. That was the purpose. It was not the intention to change the meaning of the reservation in any particular at all, but there was a view entertained, I think, perhaps quite generally in the bipartisan conference that the reservation as originally reported was unnecessarily prolix, and that the ideas could perhaps be adequately expressed by the use of less language. I did undertake, not to change it in any particular, but to reduce it in extent by using fewer words.

It is not expressly provided in the proposed substitute that Congress will provide the necessary legislation, and that is recited in the original reservation. But, Mr. President, with all deference to the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] with reference to that matter, I do not think it is necessary at all, because whenever we enter into a treaty with a foreign power that the Government of the United States will do certain things and legislation by the Congress is necessary to accomplish it, we necessarily enter into an agreement that Congress will enact the necessary legislation. Take the seal-fisheries treaty, for instance. The Government of the United States agreed to divide the pelts that are annually killed with the other nations subscribing to the treaty in a certain proportion, but in order to carry out that agreement legislation by Congress is necessary. We must appoint a commission to make the division, and in the legislation we must direct how the division shall be made.

So when we agreed with other powers for the creation of a certain commission upon which the United States is entitled to representation, and we also provide that no one can sit as a representative of the United States until he is authorized to do so by an act of Congress, we necessarily agree that Congress will provide the necessary legislation. I do not think that the effect is changed in the slightest degree nor that there is anything of substance in the original draft which is omitted from the new draft. In my own judgment, the amendment tendered by the Senator from Nebraska does not add in any degree whatever to the obligation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have not tendered any amendment. I merely called attention to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated that this proposed substitute included everything that was in the original reservation. I called his attention to the fact that this matter was omitted. It is rather binding to say that—

> No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States, providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

It seems to me that that alone, without the statement that the United States will act indicates a purpose not to act and to nullify the ratification of the treaty. Inasmuch as the language was in the original reservation containing a promise that Congress would act, it seemed to me it would be proper to put it in the pending substitute. Do I understand that the Senator from Montana would not accept such an amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not the slightest objection to it. My own idea about it is that it does not add anything to it. I pause to say that I have exactly the same view about the original reservation. It provides that no one will be entitled to represent the United States upon any of these commissions until Congress by appropriate legislation provides for the appointment of the member and tells how he is to be appointed. That would be the operation without the reservation at all. In the first place, the reservation as it originally stood is entirely meaningless. You do not add to nor subtract anything from the treaty, as it would be the same as if you never adopted a reservation on that subject. I have exactly the same view with respect to the suggestion now made by the Senator from Nebraska. You do not either add to or subtract anything from it. So it is a matter of indifference to me whether the express provision is put in the substitute or not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope we will adopt the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] without any change. Our conferees got together upon it. If we are really serious in desiring to reach a place where we can ratify the treaty, here is the place to show it. I think that the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts ought to have been accepted, and now that it is offered by the Senator from Montana I hope we will all vote for it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think it would throw a great deal of light on the situation if we could have before the Senate the official report of the Versailles conference No. 2, at which this open covenant was openly arrived at. The substitute contains two propositions, as I understand it. It seems to me that they are contradictory. The first one is that—

> No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States—

That contradicts the next one, or it leaves us without representation forever. It goes on then and gives the other clause—

nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of Congress—

And so forth.

It begins with the assertion that no person shall represent the United States, and then it provides that no citizen shall represent the United States unless it is provided for by law. It leaves out of what is in the original proposition, in addition to that difficulty, that whoever is selected or appointed to represent the United States on any of these boards must be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I wondered if we could not have a caucus to determine what we are going to do upon this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator have it open, openly arrived at?

The original reservation provides that not only shall Congress provide by law—and it is made the duty of Congress so to do—for representation, but it provides, to a certain extent, that one of the provisions that must be in that law is that the appointments must have the confirmation of the Senate. Under the substitute, a law can be passed that will provide for the appointment of representatives on any of these boards without such confirmation; the power of appointment can be given to the President absolutely or it can be given to somebody else absolutely. It seems to me that if we must have these boards, we ought to surround them with all the proper safeguards that will give us the right kind of national representation. Senators in the past have been jealous of their rights to have a part in the appointment of officials to represent the United States, but if this substitute is adopted we make it possible for that right to be taken away.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If the original reservation were adopted providing for confirmation, and a law should be subsequently passed providing for appointment without confirmation, which does the Senator think would control?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not conceive of Congress passing a law that will be on its face a plain violation of a solemn treaty. This becomes a part of the treaty, and it states that these appointments must be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks the Senate would ever pass a law which did not provide for confirmation?

Mr. NORRIS. I can see a condition that might arise where the Senate would be driven into that very position exactly. We might get into a deadlock where we should have to recede from such a proposition in the enactment of a law or not have any law, and we might be in a position where Congress would be, as it has, to a greater or lesser extent, been in the past, a rubber stamp of an Executive, who might demand a certain kind of a law. When such a law is once upon the statute books, in order to change it, it would require the consent not only of the Senate, but of the House of Representatives and of the President as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator from Montana propose the reservation which was withdrawn by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana for the reservation reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Massachusetts desires to renew his motion, I shall be glad to withdraw mine.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as the substitute which I offered has been objected to by those who proposed it, I think it is safer to hold to the original reservation, because it says "Congress will provide by law," which I think is proper. It also makes it clear—and in this respect I think the substitute is somewhat doubtful—that by the treaty these officials must all be subject to the approval of the Senate. I think the reservation as originally drawn is better in that regard. I agreed to the substitute, as I did to others, because I thought it would advance agreement in the Senate; but as those who offered it do not agree about it I think it is safer to adhere to the original reservation.

Mr. REED. I move to amend the substitute by adding at the end thereof the following words:

And no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment to the substitute which is proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LODGE. One moment, Mr. President. That brings it back substantially to the form of the original reservation, except that it leaves out the provision that Congress shall provide by law for the appointment.

Mr. REED. Yes; and it makes perfectly plain—and that is what I desire to emphasize—that the substitute does entirely omit to express the determination that the Senate must advise and consent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the substitute with the amendment of the Senator from Missouri added, because then it certainly covers all that we desire to cover. There is no difference in the purpose of the two reservations, and I do think the provision in regard to the approval of the Senate is very important.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I hope that the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] will be adopted. Who constituted the conference I do not know, but I understand it was the desire of the Senators who attended it to arrive at some kind of compromise, without sacrificing any principle that has been advocated by Senators on either side of the Chamber. One Senator on the other side has risen and objected; but I do not take it that that means that the other members of that conference have objected. I agree with the Senator from Montana that this condensed substitute covers all that we desire.

We are to enact a law providing for the appointment of the men who are to serve on these various commissions and on the council. It is unreasonable for me to believe that that law would not provide what is usually provided in such cases. I do not think we have to go into the A B C class in order to state what is intended by the Senate. It is clear to me—and I am of very ordinary intelligence—and I think it is clear to other Senators. I should like to see this proposition which has been put forward on the other side receive a vote in the Senate at least, and I hope the Senator from Montana will not withdraw it, but will give us an opportunity, at any rate, to vote on the proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator from Michigan object to inserting a provision providing for the approval of the appointments of these officials by the Senate? Such a provision is usually embodied in our legislation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should not object to that; but I do not think it makes any difference whether or not such a provision is inserted. If, however, there has been an agreement on this proposition, with the exception of one Senator, I should like to have the proposition submitted to the Senate, because I am inclined to believe that that is exactly what would have to be done; that there would have to be action by the Senate in confirmation of such appointments.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, what the Senator from Nebraska said was perfectly correct. There were no binding agreements made in the conference; we did not undertake to bind anybody, either the Senate or ourselves. The Senator from Nebraska is right about that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not want to be understood as implying that it was binding; I understand it as does the Senator from Massachusetts; but it was attempted to agree on this proposition, and I should like to see that attempt put to a test, especially as I can see no radical difference between the two propositions.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to see the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] added.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Michigan should refer to me as criticizing rather than objecting to this particular amendment. What I objected to was the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] putting me in a position as though I had agreed to the amendment. I am perfectly free to do as I please about all of the amendments which were discussed and formulated by the bipartisan conference.

Mr. TOWNSEND. To be perfectly frank with the Senator from Nebraska, I think he did not himself understand what he was doing when he was criticizing the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I certainly was criticizing it; I was not stating that I should oppose it. I stated that I thought it did not contain all that it was intended to contain, and the Senator from Massachusetts has stated that it was intended to be an abbreviation of what was in the original reservation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And I think it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I pointed out one thing which it failed to include, and suggested that it ought to be made to include it. I did not intend to go so far as the Senator indicates in the matter, for I feel free to do as I please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the substitute of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which the Secretary will now state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed substitute of Mr. WALSH, after the word "duties," it is proposed to add a comma and the following words:

And no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw that amendment to the amendment and to offer in lieu of it another, which accomplishes the same purpose but follows the language of the proposed substitute. This is my proposal, to add:

And no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of any such body or agency except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

The language of the amendment I first offered was taken from the Lodge reservation, which varies in its description of the tribunals and agencies from that which is employed in the substitute. The amendment I am now offering is merely intended to conform to the language of the substitute, so that instead of repeating the words "member of said commissions, committees, tribunals, courts, councils, or conferences," I simply adopt the language of the substitute, which is "appointed as a member of any such body or agency, except with the approval of the Senate of the United States."

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be better to say "confirmation by the Senate"?

Mr. REED. I think they mean the same. We might say "except with the advice and consent of the Senate," but "with the approval" means the same, and I offer the amendment in that form.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would be added to the draft of the amendment of the Senator from Montana. In that event I shall very cheerfully accept it and shall make no opposition to it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask for the reading of the draft of the amendment as it would read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed substitute of Mr. WALSH of Montana, after the word "duties," it is proposed to add a comma and the words "and no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of any such body or agency, except with the approval of the Senate of the United States," so that it will read:

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties, and no citizen of the United States shall be selected or appointed as a member of any such body or agency, except with the approval of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is rather embarrassing——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Montana.

Mr. REED. I merely wish to make a correction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. It is rather embarrassing, but I hastily prepared the amendment on the floor, and in its reading I detect what I think is a mistake. The language, instead of being "and no citizen of the United States shall be appointed," should be "and no person shall be appointed." I ask to make that change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The change will be made according to the request of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should not like to have my position about this matter misunderstood in the slightest degree. The amendment, in my opinion, offered by the Senator from Missouri is entirely unnecessary; the subject matter is already covered by the language of the proposed substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if Congress legislated and provided for the appointment in a different way, would not that control instead of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think so; but however that may be, Mr. President, the amendment as it is proposed is to the effect that no one whomsoever shall represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible to sit as a member, by whomsoever he is appointed, except pursuant to an act of Congress. A law of Congress accordingly will be passed, and that law will provide by whom this representative may be appointed. If the Senate does not want to have the man appointed without its approval, of course it will not give its approval to any law that provides otherwise. The Senate has an opportunity to have its say when the law is being enacted, and if it does not want it, it does not have to have it. It can reject any proposal that does not contemplate the appointment in exactly the manner provided.

But, Mr. President, to go further than that, so far as any representative of the United States is concerned, it is taken care of by the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the President of the United States, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, * * * and all other officers of the United States," except those whose appointment is otherwise provided for by law. So it is there, and we do not need to put it in the reservation; the Constitution has already taken care of it.

Bear in mind that I undertook to act only in the capacity of a parliamentary draftsman. I was not expressing my ideas about what the reservation ought to be; I was simply undertaking to put the meaning of the reservation as it stood in less language. It is a matter of entire indifference to me whether my draft is accepted or the draft as it was originally prepared. In my judgment, both of them are entirely needless, or either of them is so. So if my substitute shall be adopted—and it is a matter of entire indifference to me whether it is or not—I shall vote against it anyway because I do not think that any reservation on the subject is necessary, and I believe that the treaty will have exactly the same effect whether there is a reservation or not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not, perhaps, justified in discussing the reservation, but it is perfectly apparent that we are drifting away from reservations and coming to the question either of sustaining or defeating the bipartisan committee. It seems to me that, after having adopted these reservations upon the 19th of November, if we are going to adopt reservations at all, in view of the fact that Senators on the other side are very frank in saying that whatever we write they do not propose to vote for, I do not see why our time is occupied in this way. I think that their position is a perfectly logical one; I do not understand that they are binding themselves to vote for the reservations, but if they are not going to vote for them, why should we redraft the reservations in order that we may vote for them? It really occurs to me, Mr. President, that instead of the bipartisan committee acting as leader upon the floor the Senator from Massachusetts ought to act as leader.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course I assume that it would have great weight with the Senator if the self-constituted bipartisan committee had agreed upon anything; everybody else ought to change his opinion forthwith, I assume; but, as nearly as I can get at it, if anybody has the temerity to intimate that they ever agreed on anything he is immediately called a prevaricator, and every member of the conference appears to feel insulted that he is accused of having agreed with his colleagues upon anything. Not only do they get up and openly repudiate it, but it is all we can do to conduct the debate here in parliamentary terms. There is more feeling engendered in the "harmony" produced by this conference committee than there was in the composition of the original reservation.

Now, look what happens here. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is acting in good faith in the interest of harmony and cordial rapprochement between the two sides of the Chamber, gets up and sacrifices his original reservation, and accepts that of the conference committee, although he does not believe in it, he says, and thinks his own is the better. He meets the Senator from Nebraska in going more than halfway. He abandons his own reservation and accepts in toto the product of the conference committee.

That seems to throw the other members of the conference committee into a state of high dudgeon, and they immediately repudiate any such unauthorized and presumptuous concession on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts, and up rises the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and promptly says it is defective unless he can put on a finishing touch as an amendment to perfect it, whereupon up gets the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], another member of the harmony committee, and states that the Senator from Nebraska, having agreed to it in conference, has no business to be amending it here in the open; whereupon the Senator from Nebraska throws the "allegator" at the Senator from Wisconsin, saying that he never agreed to anything, although in the previous sentences he had said that it was all passed upon in the committee. Then, not to be outdone in the exchange of drolleries and royal politeness, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] gets up and says he is against it all—it is all unnecessary, not to say impertinent and irrelevant—and he was only a legislative reference bureau in the matter, anyway—he had no responsibility for it; he hated the idea of it, but he was the only mind and hand really competent, in this self-selected committee of perfectionists, to place before this body in its high deliberations something that as a sine qua non he would never vote for himself, anyway.

So, Mr. President, I state again that we are progressing rapidly. We are now "perfecting" the amendments which the Senate, in a sane moment last November, placed upon this treaty. It more or less makes me feel that I have wandered into an assembly where I can not contribute anything toward the consummation of the proceeding in which they are engaged. If, however, the Senator from Massachusetts thinks the reservation he voted for on November 19 is the best one, I hope he will stand by his convictions and vote for it; and if the Senator from Montana thinks none of them is useful, I hope he will vote against them all. As for me, I think just as I did on November 19, and I shall vote for the same reservation that I voted for then.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I take it that the only purpose and object of offering these modifications that were tentatively agreed to in the conference was upon the theory that it would help the two sides to get together upon a ratification of the treaty, and unless that purpose is to be served there can be no possible object in adopting these modifications.

Inasmuch as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has frankly stated that if this amendment is adopted he proposes to vote against the reservation as amended, I can see no possible good to come through the adoption of the amendment. Therefore I hope it will be defeated and the original reservation adopted.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, before the Senate abandons this metaphysical exercise, this engagement in verbal contortion, this oratorical perambulation in which it has been occupied during the greater part of the afternoon, it may be permissible for a mere novice to ask, To what purpose are we addressing ourselves day after day?

It is asserted—without any great show of conviction, to be sure—by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that the substitute reservations are offered in an endeavor to effect an agreement. God save the mark! They are offered in an endeavor to convey to one element in the country one meaning and to another element another meaning. They are offered to convey one meaning to America and another to Europe. If they are not offered to that end, why should they be offered at all? We sit here spinning phrases hour after hour.

SEVERAL SENATORS. What is the Senator doing?

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, I am spinning a little lace to adorn the fabric woven by the master hands.

There are some of us who have considerable correspondence to answer. A great flood of protests has come into my office in the last few days against the horrors perpetrated in Korea. We have a great correspondence, in the mere answering of which we might be occupied if we were not sitting here debating like medieval theologians as to how many angels may dance on the point of a needle.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say just an additional word, in view of some comments made by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber.

I accepted the invitation to act on the so-called bipartisan conference committee—the harmony committee, as it is now being called, perhaps appropriately—in the hope that we would be able to agree upon some modification of these reservations through which all of those favoring ratification of the treaty would be enabled to vote for a resolution of ratification. I had a very earnest hope that we should be able thus to agree, but we were not; and the committee, after it had proceeded with its work for some time, and had proposed tentative changes in some of these reservations, passed to the consideration of the reservation in relation to article 10, and it broke up under circumstances to which I have heretofore adverted, and of which I do not care now to speak again.

If we had concluded, I should very cheerfully have come to the Senate and voted in favor of every one of those reservations, and voted for the resolution of ratification with them as a part of it; but, as I say, we did not. We broke up without agreeing, and the work that we did with respect to the reservations, including article 10, has not been accepted upon the other side of the Chamber. No one upon the other side of the Chamber has tendered a reservation in relation to article 10 expressing the views of the conference committee so far as they had reached any agreement with respect to the matter; and, of course, under those circumstances I do not feel under any obligation whatever to vote for any of the reservations, even though they are amended as was suggested or tentatively agreed upon in the committee; and, without any regard to whether the agreement in the committee was tentative or otherwise, it was not carried out.

I do not, therefore, feel under any kind of obligation to vote for these amendments, and we have recurred to the original proposition. I shall be very glad to help to put these reservations, so far as I can, in a form that is acceptable to the Senate, but I do not intend to vote for them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of the debate of the last few minutes, which demonstrates pretty conclusively that the substitute which has been offered, and to which I have offered an amendment, is merely a legislative waif that nobody really cares to father, I think I shall withdraw from any share of the responsibility by withdrawing the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws the proposed amendment. The question now is upon the substitute of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] for reservation No. 7.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am as sensible of the humorous side of the efforts of the bipartisan conference as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and I entirely appreciate what he has said about it; but I want to say to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] that when it comes to telling the world what other people's motives are it is well to tread carefully, because I have not yet met anybody in my pilgrimage who was able to read the human heart or to tell what the motives of other people were. It is often attempted, but I do not think anyone knows.

Mr. President, there is this, and perhaps only this, to be said for the bipartisan conference: It was an honest effort to bring about some agreement which would enable us to ratify the treaty with the reservations. We came to no agreement. I joined in that effort because I have tried to secure the ratification of the treaty, during the months that I have been concerned with it, with reservations which I thought would protect the safety and the independence and the sovereignty of the United States, and I will not vote to ratify the treaty unless there are reservations which effect those things; but I was not willing to say that I would listen to no modifications; that I would shut the door on any further attempts to reach a ratification. That I decline to do.

Whatever was done there, there was no attempt to deceive anybody. I have stated these modifications that were proposed and tentatively agreed to; I have stated them here fairly, as I understood them, and I had hoped that those that had been tentatively agreed to would be accepted here. I had no other purpose. I can not imagine who can be deceived.

As for time being wasted, I know, of course, that the Senator from Illinois and other Senators are greatly oppressed with correspondence. I have had some letters myself; but it seemed to me that the most important thing was to try to dispose of the treaty, to try to settle it. If we can not ratify it, let us show it to the country and send it back where it came from. If we can get an agreement by which we can ratify it, let us get it; and I thought the second attempt was worth making.

I am not much of a medieval theologian, although I have heard of the familiar illustration of the angels dancing on a needle point; but I do not think time is wasted if we can bring about the ratification of the treaty and its final disposition, and take it away as an obstruction to the public business. I hope we shall do it as rapidly as possible, and whatever disposition the Senate makes of these reservations will be acceptable to me.

I offered this particular one in good faith. It had been prepared by a distinguished Democrat on the conference committee. It was supported by them all. It never occurred to me that they would stand here and oppose it; but apparently the plan is to oppose and try to change every modification, and, after the modifications are put on, if they get on, then, on the other side, to vote against the reservation.

No agreement, no arrangement, can be possible under such terms as those. After the performance we have had here this afternoon, when we come forward and take in the very words in which it was drawn and offered the amendment prepared by the Senator from Montana, and he then gets up here and says he does not believe any amendment is necessary, that he is going to vote against the reservation anyway, I can only say that, so far as I am concerned, I am through with it, and I shall offer no more modifications to attempt anything on that line. I am coming back to the reservation we adopted on the 19th of November, and which had the support of a decided majority of the Senate; and if the Senator from Montana wants a vote on his reservation as he now has it, I shall be glad, for one, to vote against it.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator from Massachusetts, it is his purpose to offer the reservations as they were voted upon on the 19th of November?

Mr. LODGE. I was referring to those that came out of the conference. I shall not offer those. There are two changes which personally I think ought to be made for the improvement of the reservations, and those I shall offer upon my own account for the Senate to dispose of as it may please.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that, so far as the reservations which came out of the conference are concerned, they are to be offered by some one else?

Mr. LODGE. I shall offer no more of them.

Mr. BORAH. We can make some progress if that is the program.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want it to be understood, Mr. President, that I do not agree that I shall not offer any further changes.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. BORAH. No one had any such understanding, of course.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, the reservations are open to all the changes that may be desired to be offered by any Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Minnesota has several reservations in his pocket. He might exhibit them and give us an opportunity to see them.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator does not understand that.

Mr. BORAH. I do understand exactly that thing.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is not true.

Mr. BORAH. They may not be in the Senator's pocket, but he has been writing them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say in behalf of this side of the Chamber that there is no expectation that any of the reservations agreed upon by the bipartisan conference as are going to be offered on the other side, nor do we understand that any member of that conference is under any kind of an obligation to offer them unless he cares to do so.

Mr. LODGE. They are not. I have said that again and again. There was no obligation, and we did not attempt to bind anybody. We made an attempt in good faith, all of us I think on both sides, to try to get an agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the Senator a question? What was the object of this so-called bipartisan conference, if they did not intend to bind even themselves to anything?

Mr. LODGE. They did not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then they were just holding a conference for fun?

Mr. LODGE. Senators from your side came to me and asked for it, and I agreed to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And you appointed certain conferees on your side?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And some one appointed certain conferees upon our side, and they met and conferred without any intention of agreeing to anything.

Mr. LODGE. That is not true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, then, the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. We did have the intention of agreeing, and we tried on both sides.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They did intend to do that?

Mr. LODGE. They did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And now the Senator tells us that they were tentative agreements which meant nothing, that they merely agreed to them in fun, and would see about them later on.

Mr. LODGE. They were tentative, with the view of an understanding, if we could get a complete agreement on all. There was no complete agreement, and therefore they fell.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They fell by the wayside?

Mr. LODGE. They did. They fell where your treaty has fallen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And nobody cares for them now?

Mr. LODGE. I certainly do not care about them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought not. I had that idea all the time.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not true that every Member on this side who was a member of that conference is ready to keep those tentative agreements that were made and vote for them if the other side will do so?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely; every one of us, and we have been all along.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had supposed when we took up the treaty again that we understood, at least as to a number of the reservations, that certain modifications would be made. As to this particular reservation, the substitute was prepared by a distinguished Senator on this side of the Chamber, and I think it most unfortunate that we did not promptly accept that substitute when it was presented by the Senator from Massachusetts. I think it is admirably phrased and covers everything that is necessary and is a substantial improvement upon the original reservation on the same subject. I still hope that we may be able to accept it. I think it is a reservation that should satisfy every Senator, and I hope that others, with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], will join in supporting it as reoffered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

I am glad the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] withdrew his amendment, because it was entirely unnecessary. I should have voted against his amendment. The Congress, when it passes legislation upon this subject, will prescribe the manner of selection and appointment. It will have the right to determine which of the places require confirmation and which do not. Even if we added a provision similar to that suggested by the Senator from Missouri, Congress when passing the legislation could direct otherwise, and Congress would not be bound by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri, that none of these representatives should act unless appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Such a provision in this reservation would not be binding upon Congress. Congress may change it and control the subject when the legislation is passed.

If we are really to do anything toward ratifying the treaty, here is a reservation which we all agree is proper, and to which, as I understand, nobody objects. I earnestly hope that the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana may still be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. NORRIS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote, as I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I repeat the announcement heretofore made that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question. He is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and in his absence withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair, if present, would support the substitute. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], but I feel at liberty to vote on this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement previously made concerning the illness of my pair and his absence, and the transfer of that pair, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Announcing my pair as heretofore and its transfer to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. Announcing my pair as before and the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE. I am informed that my pair, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], if present, would vote "yea." Therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—37.

Beckham	Harris	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Myers	Thomas
Culberson	Hitchcock	New	Townsend

So the substitute of Mr. WALSH of Montana for reservation No. 7 was agreed to, as follows:

No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to reservation No. 7 as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Have we not adopted a substitute?

Mr. LODGE. We have adopted a substitute and a vote is now required on the reservation as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was it not an entire substitute?

Mr. LODGE. It was; but it was an amendment, of course, and the reservation as amended has to be voted upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. They have already been asked for.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was an amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. LODGE. It was a substitute in the nature of an amendment. Of course, it requires a vote on the reservation. I ask for the regular order and call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood I was recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Montana.

Mr. REED. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is the proposition which we have just substituted for the reservation now open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. It is not open to amendment, because the Senate adopted it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion it is not open to amendment in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire simply to repeat what I have said before. While my position with respect to this matter may seem to some people to be inconsistent, it is not so at all.

I have heretofore declared that I simply endeavored to put the reservation in what I believed to be better language. I do not by that act nor by anything done heretofore desire to indicate that I think such a reservation is at all necessary. I do not think so. As I said before, if we had been able to agree upon these matters, I would very cheerfully have voted for every one of the reservations and for the resolution of ratification with the reservations on; but, as the proceedings came to naught, I do not feel under any obligation whatever to carry out that purpose, and I shall accordingly vote against the adoption of this reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to renew my point of order——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I was simply going to ask for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is quite willing to be advised in the matter, but is of the opinion that the reservation has been adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the point of order I desired to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that be not true, the Chair will be very glad to be advised in regard to it.

Mr. LODGE. I may be all wrong, but it is a matter which has been very much fixed in my mind for a great many years that when a motion is carried to strike out and insert, the language inserted is not open to amendment, but the motion prevails because the body has adopted that precise language. But we have then to vote on the original proposition as amended. The fact that a substitute has been adopted does not pass the original proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This in no sense was an amendment. It was a complete substitute.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, it was.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We were at liberty to perfect the original proposition by amendment. We were at liberty to perfect the substitute by amendment. We adopted the substitute, and that ended it. That is the procedure by which we have conducted business here time and again, and the vote for the substitute was the adoption of it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia is entirely incorrect in the statement of the parliamentary status. It is easily illustrated by the attitude of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the author of the substitute. This amendment in the form of a substitute was agreed to as a substitute for the pending reservation. The substitute is now pending in exactly the same parliamentary status as the original reservation.

The Senator from Montana has already declared that he intended to vote against his substitute if it was agreed to. There may have been a number of Senators who voted for the substitute, hoping that when the final question recurred on the substitute it might then be defeated entirely. Nobody can conclude that a majority of the Senate favors the substitute until the final action of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest that there is absolutely nothing of the original proposition left? There is nothing left now but the substitute.

Mr. GORE. Certainly not.

Mr. FLETCHER. It takes the place of the original proposition, and we do not have to vote on it again because we have voted on it once.

Mr. GORE. It took the place of the original proposition pending before the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I suggest in a word this thought? The Senate had before it a reservation. It had before it a substitute for that reservation. We did not vote to pass the substitute. We voted to substitute the substitute for the other proposition. That is the question we voted on. Anyone might have voted to place that substitute in the place of the reservation, but he still has the right to vote on whether he wants that substitute adopted as a reservation. That is all the argument I want to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may observe that there must be many precedents upon this question, and the Chair would be very glad if some one of the Senators who understands parliamentary law, as the Chair does not, would state some of the precedents, so that we may be advised.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have examined Gilfry's Precedents in the Senate, and I do not find any precedent for this question. If I may be permitted the suggestion, it is so elementary that an amendment must be again voted on that a precedent would not be found, although I may state that there are very many of them in Hinds' Precedents in the House.

May I recall to the Chair the situation? The adoption of a substitute is nothing but an amendment. The Senate has the right at all times to perfect the amendment in any way it chooses. If the substitute is adopted the Senate has the right to say that as between the original proposition and the substitute proposition they prefer the substitute, but then they must have the right to vote against the substitute on the original proposition as amended.

I assure the Chair that there can be and will be found no precedent to the contrary, but I am very sure that in the House many precedents can be found, and the practice has always been, I may say without exception, that where an amendment is adopted in the form of a substitute there must be a vote upon the question as amended by the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will accept that view of the matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion, I think I am right in saying that the Senate railroad bill was substituted for the House railroad bill. That was done, I think, at the beginning of the consideration of the bill here. Does anyone suggest that the substitution of the Senate bill for the House bill made it needless to have a vote in order to pass the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask the Chair the question?

Mr. LODGE. I merely make the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again announce that he accepts that view of the matter.

Mr. LODGE. I did not hear the statement of the Chair. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts requests the yeas and nays. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, has the Chair ruled?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the effect of the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ruled that the adoption of the substitute is not an adoption of the reservation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, I do not want to be recognized. I think the Chair is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as previously in reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement regarding my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when the name of Mr. SIMMONS was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I do not know that I shall have an opportunity to transfer that pair, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I am paired, is unfortunately ill and absent. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I am informed that my pair, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], if present would vote in the affirmative upon the pending question. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Again announcing the transfer of my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I find I can transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I do so, and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]; and

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—55.

Harding	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.

So the reservation reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations as amended was agreed to, as follows:

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

Mr. REED subsequently said: Mr. President, the time has really passed for making the observation I now desire to make, but at the conclusion of the vote I rose to call attention to the importance of the ruling the Chair made on the point of order. It will be observed that, as a result of the ruling upon the point of order, which was correct, another vote was taken in the Senate, which gave the author of the substitute which had just been accepted by the Senate, and for which its author voted as a substitute, the opportunity to cast his vote against his own substitute, which also affords an illustration of how easy it is to be sometimes jockeyed into a position where you lose a race with the best horse.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

As in legislative session,

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 3076. An act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 12046. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented memorials of sundry citizens of Albuquerque, N. Mex., and of sundry citizens of Loyalty, Holden, and Lincoln, all in the State of Missouri, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of the Pioneers of Alaska, Igloo No. 7, of Valdez, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation making an appropriation for the repair of the Government Military Highway in Keystone Canyon, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Vermont, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the parole of Federal prisoners, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of Leighr A. Wright Post, No. 53, American Legion, of Hillsdale, Mich., praying for compulsory military training, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of Leighr A. Wright Post, No. 53, American Legion, of Hillsdale, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a bonus for ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Drummond, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the public protection of maternity and infancy, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ann Arbor, Mich., praying for the fulfillment of treaty obligations with Korea, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a memorial of Local Lodge No. 7, Metal Polishers' International Union, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Sterling sedition bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

MARKING OF WOOL.

Mr. CAPPER. I presented a petition from the Utah State Wool Growers' Association and the American National Live Stock Association on the 26th of February last, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance. I ask that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, that committee having charge of the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 4013) to amend the land-leasing act of February 25, 1920; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4014) authorizing the adjustment of the boundaries of the Olympic National Forest, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A bill (S. 4015) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms and conditions with respect to improvements to be made on the present target range as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or, in lieu of such improvements to be made on the present target range, the Secretary of War may accept a conveyance to the United States of such other lands, to be designated by the Secretary of War, as may be deemed suitable for a target range in exchange for such overflow lands; that to facilitate the acquisition of the necessary additional lands the Secretary of War is authorized to condemn land necessary and suitable for target-range purposes, such condemnation to be at the expense of said Lloyd E. Gandy, grantee, his heirs and assigns; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4016) to establish a stationery office in the Department of the Treasury; to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (S. 4017) to extend the powers of the Comptroller of the Treasury to create the office of accounts in the Department of the Treasury and to provide for an annual budget of estimates and report of the fiscal operations of the Treasury; to the Special Committee to Devise a Plan for a Budget System.

NAVAL RADIO SYSTEM.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to open certain naval radio stations for the use of the general public, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to open certain naval radio stations for the use of the general public was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a letter from the Secretary of the Navy on the subject of the use of the naval radio system for commercial and press purposes. The letter is explanatory of the joint resolution just introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from California to ask that something be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] introduced a joint resolution relative to the use of the Navy's radio system. When transmitted by the Secretary of the Navy it was accompanied by a letter, and I asked unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD, because it explains the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. The letter can be referred to the committee just as well, for that is where it will be considered, and there is no need of encumbering the RECORD with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the letter is a matter of information for the Senate, and the Chair had already ruled that the request to print it in the RECORD was approved when the Senator from Utah made his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I was trying to get recognition of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had not finally ruled on the request. The Senator from Utah objects.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3942) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces, and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether the objection of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, has been removed?

Mr. FLETCHER. The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has no objection, and the Committee on Public Lands, I understand, consent to the reference I have asked.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. To which committee does the Senator ask that the bill be referred?

Mr. FLETCHER. To the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. The bill pertains largely to their jurisdiction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the RECORD, I wish to say that I still believe that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, but so long as the Senator introducing the bill desires it to be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, I am not going to make objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask if my motion has been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for the order asked for by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I only made the inquiry because the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency solicited me to oppose the proposed change of reference, and I am now asking the Senator from Florida the question whether that Senator has withdrawn his opposition?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have stated that the chairman of that committee has agreed to the change of reference.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Connecticut has withdrawn his opposition to the change of reference.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps the Senator from Nebraska will accept the word of the Senator from Utah on that subject; and I hope that is satisfactory.

Mr. GRONNA. Until I can get some information about this bill, being a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I shall object to the change of reference for the present.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am going to move to have the Committee on Banking and Currency discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, because the Committee on Banking and Currency refuses to go on with it, and I do not propose to have the bill hung in the air.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that we are in open executive session, and everything is being done by unanimous consent. Under those circumstances I move that the Senate as in open executive session take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, March 5, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, Author of the universe, Father of all souls, we stand before Thee in awe and reverence and pray that Thou wilt sway our minds, direct our ways, by the holy spirit of truth, that they may conform to Thy purposes. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Elliott	Kennedy, R. I.	Robsion, Ky.
Bankhead	Ellsworth	Kreider	Rodenberg
Bell	Ferris	Langley	Rose
Blackmon	Fields	Larsen	Rucker

Dewalt	Jones, Pa.	Rainey, Ala.	Wise
Doughton	Kahn	Reber
Eagle	Kendall	Riddick
Edmonds	Kennedy, Iowa	Robinson, N. C.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-one Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSTON of New York, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WINGO, for five days, on account of attendance on the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD.

To Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, 11 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. TIMBERLAKE, at the request of Mr. VAILE, for the day, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. O'CONNELL, continued leave of absence, on account of the illness of his wife.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday the previous question had been ordered on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and all amendments had been agreed to except two, upon which a separate vote was demanded. The question will now come on those amendments. The Clerk, without objection, will report the first amendment on which a separate vote was demanded.

Page 9, strike out lines 15 and 16 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The salaries and expenses of maintenance of legislative drafting service as authorized by section 1343 of the revenue act of 1918, $40,000, one-half of such amount to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and one-half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next amendment as reported last night is a very long amendment about inserting the provision for the surveyors general.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there were few Members present, comparatively, last evening, and there is a large attendance now, I ask that the amendment be again read.

Mr. CALDWELL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 133, noes 113.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. As many as favor taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-three gentlemen have arisen, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered. As many as favor the amendment will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nays 154, answered "present" 1, not voting 94, as follows:

Mr. GOODALL with Mr. EAGLE.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. BLACKMON.

Mr. CRAMTON with Mr. McANDREWS.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky with Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina.

Mr. WINSLOW with Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROWNE with Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa with Mr. MANN of South Carolina.

Mr. RODENBERG with Mr. FERRIS.

Mr. McPHERSON with Mr. SCULLY.

Mr. GOOD with Mr. DEWALT.

Mr. SNELL with Mr. FIELDS.

Mr. HAUGEN with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. ELLIOTT with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana with Mr. MAJOR.

Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. HUDDLESTON.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois with Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina.

Mr. MASON with Mr. WHALEY.

Mr. REBER with Mr. DOREMUS.

Mr. KREIDER with Mr. JOHNSTON of New York.

Mr. COPLEY with Mr. CARAWAY.

Mr. KENDALL with Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina.

Mr. REBER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. REBER. I was here, but I was listening to a gentleman who was explaining the amendment, and when my name was called it slipped by without my answering.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will say he was present and listening, he can qualify.

Mr. REBER. I was present, but I was listening to the gentleman who was explaining the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. REBER. Very well. Let it go, then.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. MASON. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I desire to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I have just come in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order. Is the gentleman from New Jersey qualified to make the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New Jersey opposed to the bill?

Mr. EAGAN. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EAGAN moves to recommit the bill H. R. 12610 to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

"Strike out the paragraph beginning on page 63, line 24, and ending on page 64, line 20, and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'The national prohibition act, being public No. 66, Sixty-sixth Congress, is hereby repealed on and after July 1, 1920.'"

Mr. GARRETT, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. BLANTON made a point of order.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order upon so much of the motion to recommit as provides for a change in existing law.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order against the motion to recommit because it is new legislation unauthorized by law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor at present.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the House being permitted to vote on this question. The point of order is not raised in any effort to prevent a vote, but is raised in all sincerity because I think a very important parliamentary question is involved here which ought to be passed upon by the Speaker of the House.

I assume that this amendment must rest upon the Holman rule. Under no other rule of the House, so far as I know, could it possibly be thought to be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will assume that it must be held in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. GARRETT. That being the case, I venture at this time to read the language of the Holman rule.

Nor shall any provision in any such bill—

That is, an appropriation bill—

or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

May I suggest here that that was the original Holman rule, substantially as it was first adopted. In subsequent Congresses this was added:

Provided, That it shall be in order to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law, or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, it would be useless to deny that the Holman rule, as in years past, has received many constructions, some of which are not consistent with others. So far as my investigations have extended, I do not believe it can be reasonably argued that any precedent of the past has gone to the extent that the House will go if the present proposition offered by the gentleman from New Jersey shall be held to be in order. The matter turns, I think, Mr. Speaker, upon the question of germaneness. Let us analyze the rule. The proviso upon the rule must mean something. It must have been adopted to meet some condition. Admittedly the proviso is not applicable here, because this proposition does not come from a committee which would have charge of legislation if it was introduced as an original proposition in the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Permit me a moment. Therefore the proviso does not apply, and yet the proviso must mean something. Now, if this legislation is in order, as offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, then the proviso of the Holman rule is absolutely useless and meaningless and may as well be repealed. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman says the proviso of the Holman rule is intended to qualify the first part of the Holman rule, why does it specifically say that it shall be in order further to amend the bill? Why does it not go back to the original items in the bill, to amendments offered from the floor, instead of specifically providing for further amendment?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, there are certain appropriating committees of the House that also have legislative jurisdiction. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has jurisdiction over legislation as well as over appropriations. So of the Committee on Military Affairs. So of the Committee on Agriculture, and so of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. They might bring in a proposition as an integral part of one of their appropriation bills which would be in order with or without the proviso, especially with the proviso, because then it has legislative jurisdiction, but the Committee on Appropriations has not legislative jurisdiction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman concedes that this motion would be in order were it not for the proviso?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not; but I insist that if it be in order then the proviso is useless. I am insisting that it is not in order without the proviso.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman claim that under the first provision of the Holman rule, without the proviso there is any question of the jurisdiction of the committee?

Mr. GARRETT. I do. The Committee on Appropriations has no legislative jurisdiction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman contend that it would rule out any motion made by an individual from the floor?

Mr. GARRETT. Or reported from the Committee on Appropriations unless that legislation were germane to the bill to which it is offered. This being an appropriation bill, legislation repealing existing law is not germane to any such bill.

The SPEAKER. Would the gentleman permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. There is the same provision about germaneness in the early part of the rule, is there not?

Mr. GARRETT. In the early part of the rule; yes. It is in both. It must be germane, and I am insisting that this turns upon the question of germaneness. Let me make myself clear, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. It is not in order either under the proviso or under the principal part of the rule. Of course it is not in order under the proviso, because it does not come from a committee or a joint commission; but if it should be held to be in order under the principal part of the rule, then there is no use for that proviso, because any Member of the House can rise in his place, as has the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN], and offer any amendment, without reference to the jurisdiction that would apply under the rules of the House to the legislation if proposed as an original proposition.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. The second part of the rule—that is, the proviso—might provide and could provide for cases which are not covered by the specific matters mentioned in the first part. That is, the first part provides for the reduction in the number and salaries, and so forth. There might be a proposition under the proviso which was reported from a committee which did not meet any of the specific points in the first part and yet which would retrench expenditures.

Mr. GARRETT. I trust I make myself clear. If the legislation now offered by the gentleman from New Jersey be held to be in order, I can not conceive of any case in which it would be necessary to have any report from any commission, and it would destroy the meaning of the rule.

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. ROWAN. Is not the proviso an extension rather than a limitation on the power of amendment under this section?

Mr. GARRETT. I am inclined to think it is.

Mr. ROWAN. Then, if it is an extension of the power of amendment, how does the gentleman construe these words?—

except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States * * * or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Will not this amendment reduce the amount of money covered by the bill?

Mr. GARRETT. It will; but let me say to the gentleman that my point of order is not leveled to that part of the motion to recommit which strikes out the appropriation. I am not making any point about that. That is in order. I am making the point of order to that portion of the motion to recommit which proposes to repeal an existing law.

Mr. ROWAN. May I ask this further question? Does the rule not provide that existing law can be repealed if it will reduce the amount of money appropriated?

Mr. GARRETT. That depends, of course, upon the circumstances, and that is what I am trying to argue right now. If it be germane to the legislation to which it is proposed, yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman speaks of conflicting precedents.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman prepared to say that the rulings of the very distinguished parliamentarian now sitting at his left, the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, and of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SAUNDERS, in this bill upon the question of the abolition of Subtreasuries were wrong?

Mr. GARRETT. I am not familiar with the rulings of those gentlemen on that question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Precisely the same question is here involved.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, I am stating my position. Mr. Speaker, I think it is legitimate to do here what was done in Committee of the Whole, when practically this same question was before the committee, at least as a matter of justification for consuming this much time in pressing the point of order; that is, there is a reason for the rules of the House. There is a principle lying back of every rule. These rules have been evolved out of the wisdom and experience of long years, and the wisdom and experience of these years have taught all that it is not desirable to have legislation upon appropriation bills. It is the philosophy of the House of Representatives, a wise philosophy, that legislation before being brought to the House shall receive the careful consideration of some committee of the House, and therefore under the rules of the House we have created 50 or more committees, defining as clearly as is possible the jurisdiction of each. It is right that the committees of the House should be jealous of their jurisdiction and it is right that the membership of the House should carefully guard the jurisdiction of its committees—not because of the personnel of any particular committee, of course, but because of the necessity for maintaining the integrity of the great legislative system which has been built up here through a century of experience. If this rule, called the Holman rule, can be given the latitudinarian construction that admits such legislation as is proposed in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, then at any time any gentleman can rise in his place and propose an amendment repealing any legislation which carries a charge upon the Treasury of the United States and thrust that legislation before the House to be considered in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, with five minutes of debate on either side, with no consideration from a committee whatever. That does not make for sound legislation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall be delighted to join with the gentleman in amending the Holman rule to prevent just the thing that it now allows, of which the gentleman complains.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, the gentleman and I differ as to what the Holman rule allows. I think the Holman rule serves some good purposes. I think it has served a good purpose. I do not mean that the rule ought to be strictly construed, nor do I mean that it ought to be liberally construed. I suppose those expressions, strict construction and liberal construction, have a very well-defined meaning in legal nomenclature, but, after all, all that this rule needs is just a simple construction saying what the rule says. I think that is all I care to say.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to recognition. Does the gentleman favor the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, or is he opposed to it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I favor the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, but upon a different ground, however, from that raised by the gentleman from Tennessee. In determining whether or not an amendment is germane under the Holman rule, I take it that the Speaker will look to the existing law for the purpose of determining whether or not it retrenches the net expenditures of the Government of the United States; therefore, in determining this question as to whether or not it does reduce expenditures, he will examine what is known as the Volstead Act. The Volstead Act not only provides affirmative legislation for the purpose of enforcing the prohibition amendment but it also provides the machinery whereby taxes are to be collected that will run into the thousands, hundreds of thousands, and millions, no doubt. How is the Speaker going to determine upon the face of this amendment that is proposed whether or not it comes within the purview of the Holman rule? It is not the duty—in fact, it is held in many rulings under the Holman rule that it is not within the province of the presiding officer to conjecture or to speculate as to whether it will reduce expenditures. It must be patent upon its face, when taken into consideration with the law that it attempts to repeal or modify, that the net result will be a saving to the Treasury of the United States. Now, then, as I say, the Volstead Act provides for raising money, provides the manner in which certain taxes in large amounts shall be paid; therefore is it not conjectural to the Chair whether this will retrench expenditures, whether it is not a mere speculation? If it is a speculation or a matter of conjecture, under the Holman rule it can not be sustained. I wish to raise the further point: Under the amendment, if I have read it correctly, it not only seeks to strike out certain portions of this measure but it also seeks to repeal the prohibition act. Now, if the Chair should take the amendment and the language which is sought to be stricken out of this measure, he will find that the appropriation carried is not only made for the enforcement of the prohibition law, but the appropriation is made likewise in the same item for the prosecution and enforcement of the narcotic and drugs act; therefore the proposal is not only attempting to repeal the law with reference to prohibition but the effect would be, if this point of order is sustained, that it would likewise repeal the narcotic and drugs act.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does not that apply to the merits rather than to the point of order?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think not; this whole language must be taken together. It involves not only the repeal of the prohibition act but likewise involves the repeal of other affirmative legislation. New legislation is attempted to be forced into this bill for the purpose of repealing other affirmative legislation. But I am insistent on this proposition that the point of order must be overruled for the reason that the amendment is speculative. It does not conclusively show upon its face that it will retrench in the net one single dollar or one single cent of the expenditures of the Government of the United States.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state, if he can, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, how many millions of dollars or hundreds of millions of dollars the Volstead Act is costing the taxpayers to enforce a very unpopular law——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, that is aside from the question; that is entirely aside from the question.

Mr. DYER. It is a retrenchment, if we will repeal the law and get rid of the expenditure of all these thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars in money and get rid of a lot of these thousands of men running all over the country, hounding people——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will not submit longer to interruption of the gentleman, because he is entirely out of order and is not speaking to the point of order at all, but the merits of this proposition.

Mr. DYER. I challenge the gentleman himself is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This amendment proposes to strike a certain portion from this bill, and the only rule upon which they could rely for its being sustained is the provision of the Holman rule that it will retrench the expenditures of the United States. Now, before the Speaker can say that it will do that thing he must look to the law as it stands, the law that is attempted to be repealed by this proposed amendment, and determine conclusively that it will result in the saving of money to the Treasury of the United States. I submit it is entirely speculative and purely a matter of conjecture. [Cries of "Vote"!]

Mr. DYER. The same kind of tactics used to enforce the Volstead law are being used now.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, does the Chair desire to hear any argument in support of the validity of the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The only point the Chair cares to hear argument about is the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana as to whether the repeal of the Volstead law will retrench expenditures, and the Chair thinks the burden is on the proponent of the amendment to show that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, if the Chair is in some doubt as to the decision of the occupant of the chair in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, why, then, I would be glad to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] very forcefully stated the objections and the disadvantages that might arise from the application of this rule, but that goes chiefly to the wisdom of the rule, it seems to the Chair, and not to the application of it. The Chair has read the decisions made in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and while not being bound by decisions in the committee, the Chair would always desire, because it is important that decisions be uniform, to follow the rulings made before.

And the Chair thinks, as decided in the committee, that if the repeal of a law reduces expenditures, that law being germane, an amendment providing for a repeal would be in order. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] suggests that the repeal of the Volstead law would not retrench expenditures. As to that, the Chair thinks the burden is on the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN] to show that it would retrench expenditures, and the Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman on that point.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word on that point? I think it is the first time it has ever been seriously suggested in this House or to the country that the Volstead Act was a bill for raising revenue. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has the distinction of seriously proposing that. If it was a bill for raising revenue it would not have come from the Committee on the Judiciary, but from the Committee on Ways and Means. Now, the Speaker may read the Volstead Act, and he will find that there are no taxes assessed; there is no revenue unless certain things are done by those who wish to engage in business authorized under certain licenses, and permits. It is possible that no one may make such application, but the Volstead Act does specifically authorize appropriations for the enforcement of that act, and it provides for the appointment of agents, and it provides that certain expenses may be incurred. Now, this provision of the appropriation bill is for the enforcement of the national prohibition act and carries an appropriation of $4,500,000, and under the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN] striking out that appropriation——

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that portion.

Mr. IGOE (continuing). And repealing the act, it repeals an authorization for expenditures, and for the next fiscal year, if this act is repealed, according to the estimates of the committee, it will undoubtedly effect a saving of $4,500,000.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri is confusing the two branches of the gentleman's motion.

There is no question, as the Chair understands, made by anybody that the portion of his motion striking out the appropriation is not in order. The only question is as to the repeal of the Volstead Act. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to make the point of order, not against striking out the appropriation, but simply against the repeal of the act.

Mr. GARRETT. I think the striking out of the appropriation would be in order.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair understood.

Mr. IGOE. But the Volstead Act, Mr. Speaker, authorizes an appropriation, and, on its face, if that act is repealed the authorization for appropriations is gone. There is then no authority, and by reason of that fact it effects a saving.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the wording of the rule:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

Mr. IGOE. The bill itself provides for the appointment of the necessary officers, agents, and attorneys to enforce it; provides for the purchase of supplies, the payment of office rent, and innumerable things that are necessary in the enforcement of the act. It is a very broad provision authorizing those appropriations for certain departments of this Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the statement of the gentleman answers the objection of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and that the Volstead Act does make provision for officers, which are a burden on the United States Treasury, and that therefore a repeal of that act would comply with the wording of the rule. And the Chair also thinks that, while he would be disposed to agree with the gentleman from Tennessee in the objections he made to the rule, yet, inasmuch as the amendment does on its face retrench expenditures, the Chair, following precedents, overrules the point of order. [Applause.] The question is on the motion to recommit, offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 254, not voting 89, as follows:

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. KENDALL with Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WINSLOW with Mr. CANDLER.

Mr. COPLEY with Mr. DENT.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania with Mr. DOREMUS.

Mr. GOOD with Mr. EVANS of Nevada.

Mr. KREIDER with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. LUFKIN with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. MURPHY with Mr. MCDUFFIE.

Mr. SLEMP with Mr. KETTNER.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana with Mr. ROBINSON of North Carolina.

Mr. SWOPE with Mr. BLACKMON.

Mr. BOIES with Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania.

On the vote on motion to recommit:

Mr. O'CONNELL (for) with Mr. LARSEN (against).

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York (for) with Mr. FIELDS (against).

Mr. SCULLY (for) with Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina (against).

Mr. HAMILL (for) with Mr. CARAWAY (against).

Mr. SNYDER (for) with Mr. WINGO (against).

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce for my colleagues, Mr. MCANDREWS and Mr. SABATH, that if they were here, they would vote "aye."

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the same announcement as to Congressman O'CONNELL, of Brooklyn, and Congressman JOHNSTON, of Brooklyn. If they were here, they would vote "aye." Congressman O'CONNELL is excused from attendance on the House on account of the illness of his wife, and Congressman JOHNSTON is unable to be present on account of important business.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. WOOD of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by my colleague, Mr. MCCULLOCH, in Ohio on Lincoln's birthday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by his colleague, Mr. MCCULLOCH, on Lincoln's birthday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INVESTIGATION REGARDING THE PRICE OF SUGAR.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 469.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and empowered to investigate in relation—

First. To the admitted concurrence of the Attorney General in a maximum, agreed, or fixed price of 17 cents for Louisiana clarified sugar at the plantation and of 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated sugar at the plantation made in a telegram dated November 8 last to the United States attorney at New Orleans, La., or otherwise.

Second. Whether directly or indirectly immunity from prosecutions under the statutes against profiteering in any way was given to Louisiana sugar growers or others in the sugar traffic in Louisiana.

Third. The facts and the authority of law, if any, upon which the Attorney General or his representatives or agents fixed, agreed, or concurred in the price of 17 cents for Louisiana clarified sugar at the plantation and of 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated sugar at the plantation and how such facts were obtained.

Said committee shall report its conclusions to the House at the earliest possible date, together with such recommendations as it may deem proper and desirable to submit.

And said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, and shall have the right to report at any time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to arrange with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] with respect to the time for debate on this resolution.

Mr. GARRETT. Has the gentleman any suggestion?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would be glad to have a suggestion from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. I have requests for time amounting to about 45 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, I think we can get along with 45 minutes on this side.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the time of debate on the resolution be fixed at 1 hour and 30 minutes, and that I have 45 minutes of that and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] 45 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the debate on this resolution be fixed at not to exceeed one hour and a half, of which time 45 minutes shall be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DEWALT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, from the tenor of this privileged resolution, that it is either a direct or an indirect attempt to investigate the official conduct of a member of the President's Cabinet. Primarily, of course, that is a laudable object, but the highest law officer of the land other than the court itself is the Attorney General, and while I do not have the pleasure of an intimate relation with the Attorney General, he does come from the State of Pennsylvania and is a member of the President's Cabinet, and therefore I would object to the limitation of debate to an hour and a half upon an important subject of this kind.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, of course, understands that unless an agreement is reached there will be but one hour of debate upon the question.

Mr. DEWALT. Well, there may be one hour of debate. I have no further remark to make, except what I have made, but I object to limiting the debate to one hour and a half and suggest that it be instead at least two hours, one hour on each side.

Mr. CANNON. Let it go under the 30-minute rule.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kansas will indulge me a moment, I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] that I entertain very strongly the feelings which he has just voiced touching this remarkable resolution. The gentleman from Kansas discussed with me, before this matter was called up, the question of time. I knew, of course, that it lies within the power of the gentleman from Kansas to take one of three courses. He could debate the matter three minutes himself—long enough for it to be called "debate"—and then move the previous question, whereupon the minority, of course, would have no chance to present anything whatever; or he could move the previous question without debate, and there would be 20 minutes on a side; or he could himself take the floor and occupy it for an hour, yielding to whomsoever he might please, and at the end of that hour move the previous question.

I arranged with the gentleman for this 45 minutes as the best that I thought could be obtained, in order to give us the best opportunity we might have to express what we feel about this resolution. I shall be glad to yield a portion of that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], if he desires it, but I wish the gentleman to understand my own attitude.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. DEWALT. Well, the direct question is whether the gentleman will consent to an extension of debate for an hour on each side instead of 45 minutes on each side?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think we can get on with the time agreed upon between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself.

Mr. DEWALT. Well, considering the fact that there may be a divergence of opinion on that subject, is not the gentleman willing to yield at least 15 minutes more on this side and take only 30 minutes for himself, if he thinks he can get along with that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. We have an hour and 30 minutes altogether, to be equally divided between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself.

Mr. DEWALT. But taking as my premise what the gentleman has already said, that he thinks his side can get through in 45 minutes, and that possibly we can not get through in less than an hour, will he not make it an hour and 45 minutes, giving us an hour and taking 45 minutes himself?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I see no reason for doing that.

Mr. GARRETT. Let us have an hour on a side.

Mr. DEWALT. Why the necessity for so great expedition in this matter? Why the rush to have this debate close in an hour and a half?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, we are wasting half an hour now.

Mr. GARRETT. I trust the gentleman will give us an hour on a side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no disposition to suppress debate on this resolution. I ask unanimous consent that there be an hour on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and one hour by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution brings before the House a question that has been agitating the country for 10 years—a reduction in the cost of living. Ten years ago the control of this House was turned over to the Democratic Party. During the campaign in 1910 Democrats insinuated that if they could get control of the House they would reduce the cost of living, which was not then anything like so high as it is now.

In 1912 the issue was made squarely before the people that if the Democratic Party was given full control of the Congress and the Presidency they would reduce the cost of living. The issue was made in every section of the country. The high cost of living was pointed out in every village and hamlet of the country, and it was charged that the Republican Party was responsible for the high price of every necessity of life, and, last but not least, the price of sugar. It was stated that if the Democratic Party could get control of the country all this iniquity that they said the Republicans had perpetrated upon the people would be removed.

The Democratic Party won in 1912. That party obtained the Presidency and both branches of Congress. They repealed some of the laws of which they complained, notably the tariff law, which they said was responsible for the high cost of living. Instead of reducing the cost of living they reduced the number of jobs in the United States, but the cost of living continued to mount, and it kept going higher and higher through the weeks and the months. Everybody familiar with the economic principles involved in the legislation that was attacked and in the remedies that the Democratic Party proposed in the campaign knew that the cost of living would not be reduced as the result of the enactment of such legislation as your party proposed, but I believe the people generally thought that if any Democrat had an opportunity at any time to reduce the cost of living or to keep the cost of living down he would embrace that opportunity. It was thought, of course, that if the President by any action of his could specifically save $700,000,000 to $900,000,000 a year to the American people on the one item of sugar, a daily necessity in every household, he would avail himself of that opportunity.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not just now. Everybody believed that he would select members of his Cabinet who would carry out his ideas of reducing the cost of living or of keeping the cost of living from mounting skyward.

But, contrary to the just expectations of the American people, the President totally ignored an opportunity to save them from seven to nine hundred millions of dollars a year on the cost of sugar. He had an opportunity in August, 1919, to purchase the entire sugar crop of Cuba for 6½ cents a pound. He neglected to make that purchase, though the recommendation was made by the Sugar Equalization Board which he had created. Seven members of that commission recommended and urged upon the President the purchase of Cuban sugar at 6½ cents a pound. In connection with the recommendation it was pointed out to the President that except in Cuba alone there was a shortage in the sugar crop of the world, and that if the President did not take advantage of his opportunity to purchase the Cuban sugar crop offered at that time the price would necessarily mount to a very high point. Still the President did not act, and again in September, 1919, the opportunity was once more offered to the President to purchase the Cuban sugar crop at 6½ cents a pound, and again the President refused to take advantage of his opportunity.

The next official action came apparently as a sequence of the refusal of the President to purchase the sugar crop of Cuba at 6½ cents a pound, when the Attorney General of the United States, an appointee of the President, agreed with the sugar planters of Louisiana upon 17 cents a pound for one grade of sugar and 18 cents a pound for another grade. Was there an understanding between the President and the Attorney General that the President would not purchase the sugar crop of Cuba at 6½ cents a pound so that subsequently the Attorney General could enter into an agreement with the sugar planters of Louisiana to pay 17 and 18 cents? It appears so. One action follows the other in natural sequence, and the result to-day is that the American people are paying from 18 to 22 cents a pound for sugar, instead of 10 and 11 cents a pound.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I suggest that in my district they are paying 25 cents.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are paying 25 cents in many parts of the country. This is an anomalous situation. The Democratic Party is in power to-day as the result of promises to the American people to reduce or keep down the cost of living, but it has acted directly against the public welfare and has increased the cost of living almost a billion dollars a year by increasing the price of sugar.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The cost of living has almost doubled, and even in the nonbelligerent countries of Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It has more than doubled on sugar in the United States in less than three months, owing to the inaction of the President and the action of the Attorney General.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I understood the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yielded for a question, but the gentleman was making a speech.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Does the gentleman contend that the ascendency of the Democratic Party to power tended in any degree to cause the world-wide disturbance——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The action of the President of the United States, or rather his inaction, in August and September last, and the action of the Attorney General on the 8th of November, 1919, are directly responsible for the increase in the cost of sugar from 10 and 11 cents a pound to 18 and 25 cents a pound.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What about the inaction of Congress on the 15th of September, when it was urged to take action on the Tinkham proposition? And if it had taken action at that time the Cuban sugar could have been purchased when the price was low. Why endeavor to throw the entire responsibility on the Executive?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Because the President had the sole responsibility under the law. He purchased the crop of sugar in 1918 from Cuba at 5½ cents a pound.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The sole responsibility was not on the President in 1919.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But it was. The purchase of sugar is an Executive function.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Unless Congress confesses its inability.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Congress did not have the responsibility to act on an Executive duty. The law had given him the authority and he had appointed the Sugar Equalization Board.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken when he says that the law provided for the Sugar Equalization Board. It was done, but there is no act authorizing it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I admit that there were many unauthorized acts undertaken by the President of the United States. There was a wide scope of authority given to the President in the Lever food act, and it was under the provisions of that act, we assume, that the President appointed the Sugar Equalization Board.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it not a fact, without any elaborate discussion, that the President had the power under the law to do what he did do?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let us be a little——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further. I want to show what raised the price of sugar. On November 8, 1919, the Attorney General sent a telegram to Mr. Mooney, the United States attorney at New Orleans, La., in which he said:

MOONEY,
United States Attorney, New Orleans, La.:

Your wire of the 8th, detailing results of conference. Consider agreed price rather high, but hereby concur in maximum fixed price of 17 cents for Louisiana plantation clarifieds, 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated. Understanding that all contracts for a higher to be abrogated. Further suggest, if possible, you secure an agreement in writing by authorized committee of Louisiana producers and refiners, to be used as prima facie evidence where prices are charged in excess of agreement. You are hereby instructed to immediately prosecute any violator of this agreed price.

The Attorney General fixed the price of sugar upon the American people at 17 and 18 cents a pound. Did he do this with or without authority? Whether he had authority or not—and I contend that he had no such authority—the fact is that the price of sugar to-day to the consumer is 10 or 11 cents a pound higher than it would have been if the President of the United States had done what his own Board of Sugar Equalization directed him to do in August or September of last year.

This is what Mr. Zabriskie states about the action of the Attorney General:

The sugar situation is now hopeless for the reason that it has got into politics.

Can it be that the Attorney General at that time, November 8, was so anxious for the delegation from Louisiana that he entered into the agreement that I have just read in his telegram to the United States district attorney in New Orleans? Zabriskie, the head of the Sugar Equalization Board, charges the whole thing to the fact that the sugar situation has got into politics. And he says:

The ridiculous price of 17 and 18 cents wholesale for the raw sugar now charged by the Louisiana planters is an outrage.

So says Mr. Zabriskie. He continues:

I can not say that Attorney General Palmer fixed the price, but it was known in Louisiana that he would stand for it.

The head of the Sugar Equalization Board proceeds, then, further to say:

It was known, furthermore, that he approved it. It was this folly that inspired the Cubans to make their gouge.

Why not? They had offered their sugar to us in August and September for 6½ cents a pound. When they found that the Attorney General was willing to pay the Louisiana planters 17 and 18 cents a pound, they made their gouge, very naturally.

When they saw American sugar planters getting away with 17 cents they decided it was perfectly legitimate for them to get some of the plunder, and to-day the people are paying the price for the Attorney General's mistake. Had the Sugar Equalization Board been permitted to exercise its own judgment, instead of the country facing a famine, as it now does, we would have had the largest crop of sugar in history at 6½ cents a pound.

I quote in full the statement of Mr. Zabriskie, chairman of the Sugar Equalization Board, an appointee of Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States. Here it is:

The sugar situation is now hopeless, for the reason that it has got into politics, and the sooner it gets out the better. The ridiculous price of 17 cents wholesale for the raw sugar now charged by the Louisiana planters is an outrage. I can't say that Attorney General Palmer fixed the price, but it was known in Louisiana that he would stand for it.

It was known, furthermore, that he approved it. It was this folly that inspired the Cubans to make their gouge. When they saw American sugar planters getting away with 17 cents they decided it was perfectly legitimate for them to get some of the plunder, and to-day the people are paying the price for the Attorney General's mistake.

Had the Sugar Equalization Board been permitted to exercise its own judgment, instead of the country facing a famine, as it now does, we would have had the largest crop of sugar in history at 6½ cents per pound.

Mr. Speaker, there may be some way of getting the Attorney General out of this dilemma. I can not conceive of a method by which it can be done. I have practiced criminal law some, and I have gotten a good many fellows out of pretty tight places, but if I were asked to get the Attorney General out of this dilemma I would not know just how to proceed, unless I could get the indictment quashed. It would have to be done on a technicality, and not on the merits of the case. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman states that there may be a way of getting the Attorney General out of this dilemma. Is there any way of getting the American people out of the dilemma and getting cheaper sugar for them?

Mr. KNUTSON. Next November.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Minnesota is quick on the trigger. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to bring before the House or the country a situation of this kind, but we owe something to the American people, and when a situation confronts us as squarely as this does, when executive action of the character to which I have called attention imposes a charge of 10 to 15 cents a pound for every pound of sugar consumed by the American people, it seems to me that we would be guilty of a failure to perform our duty if we did not take some action with respect to the matter. The only action that can be taken at this time is to hale the Attorney General before the Committee on the Judiciary and let him explain to them his action, and then let that committee make such report to the Congress as the circumstances require or justify. Nothing short of this would be a fulfillment of the duty of the representatives of the American people.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Senate joint resolution 156, with respect to bringing back the Polish soldiers to this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUSTED). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on Senate joint resolution 156. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INVESTIGATION REGARDING THE PRICE OF SUGAR.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum present to hear this very important matter discussed. Therefore I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUSTED). On this roll call 310 gentlemen have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, on February 14, while I was confined to my apartments with a case of the prevailing "flu," the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], the first American to fire a shot at the Austrians after the declaration of war by this country, took occasion to train his trusty gun on the Attorney General, but in so doing he violated the rules of civilized warfare. He did not use as his weapon a regulation fieldpiece, but took in its stead a blunderbus, loaded with charges of every kind and description, with the hope that he might strike the Attorney General in some vital spot.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the first shot which the gentleman fired at the Austrians was no more effective than the one which he fired at the Attorney General, I feel sure that the Austrians hold nothing against him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The fact that I am cognizant of all the facts in connection with the action taken by the office of the Attorney General with reference to the Louisiana sugar crop makes me feel that in justice to the Attorney General, as well as to the sugar producers, most of whom are in my district, I should reply to the charges made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which have no foundation either in law or in fact.

I hold no brief for the Attorney General. Personally I would have much preferred that the sugar farmers of Louisiana had been permitted to market their crop without interference on the part of the Department of Justice. Without action on the part of the Department of Justice the Louisiana producers would have received from 25 to 27 cents for every pound of sugar produced by them instead of 17 and 18 cents, and many of them would have been saved from great loss and disaster.

I have on several occasions pointed out to this House that the Louisiana sugar producers suffered one of the most disastrous years in the history of the industry; that, owing to weather conditions, only one-third of a crop was made, and that many of our factories did not turn a wheel.

I have shown that with only one-third of a crop, which cost them more to produce than a normal crop, that the Louisiana producers could not have been convicted of profiteering even though they sold their sugars for much more than 17 or 18 cents per pound.

I have shown further that at the time that the Louisiana crop began to come upon the market in November last there was a sugar famine, and that people from all over this country were willing to give the Louisiana producers fancy prices for their sugars and offered them from 25 to 27 cents per pound for their output.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, in the face of these facts, which are not denied by the gentleman from Massachusetts and which he knows to be true, he makes this statement and charge in his speech delivered on February 14, in support of this resolution of investigation:

> Sugar was sold uniformly at retail during most of 1919 at the price of 10 cents and 11 cents per pound. It is now being sold at retail at from 18 to 22 cents per pound and some in excess of this figure. As every 2 cents increase per pound is an increase in cost to the American people of $180,000,000 per annum, an increase of 10 cents is an increase in price of $900,000,000 per annum. Most of this increase in the price of this necessity, and the resulting increase in the cost of living to the American people, is chargeable entirely to the President of the United States and to his agent, the Attorney General.
> The Attorney General on November 8 last, when sugar was selling at between 11 cents and 12 cents per pound at retail, by his own admission agreed with the Louisiana sugar producers to allow them to charge 17 and 18 cents for their sugar at the plantation. The Attorney General, if he had made no agreement with the Louisiana sugar producers, would have kept the price of the Cuban crop at a reasonable figure, whereas by his action, which I shall prove was entirely illegal from his own admissions, the Cuban crop has advanced to unheard of prices, from 6½ cents per pound to 11½ cents and 12½ cents per pound at the plantation.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has forgotten both his logic and his arithmetic.

If it be true that the Attorney General in fixing the price of Louisiana sugars at 17 and 18 cents per pound thereby influenced the Cubans to increase their price from 6½ cents to 11½ and 12½ cents per pound, then what would the Cubans have gotten for their sugars if the sugar producers of Louisiana had been permitted to sell at from 25 to 27 cents per pound, and this is the price they would have received if the Attorney General had taken no action.

If the Cubans raised their price from 6½ cents to 12½ cents because Louisiana was getting 17 and 18 cents per pound, then it must follow that they would have raised their price still higher and in the same proportion, if Louisiana sold at 25 to 27 cents per pound, so that instead of the American people paying $900,000,000 more for their sugars they would have paid—according to the calculation of the gentleman from Massachusetts—$1,800,000,000 more for their sugars if the Attorney General had taken no action at all; or, in other words, accepting the statement of the gentleman as true, the Attorney General saved to the American consumers of sugar $900,000,000.

But think of the absurdity of the statement that the Louisiana crop of only 100,000 tons influenced and fixed the price of the Cuban crop amounting to over 4,000,000 tons.

The consumption of sugar in this country now amounts to 4,500,000 tons annually, and the 100,000 tons produced in Louisiana is only 2.2 per cent of the sugar consumed, or just enough to supply the people of this country eight days, and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts would lead you to believe that this mere drop in the bucket produced in Louisiana fixed and determined the price of the Cuban crop. This would clearly be a case of the tail wagging the dog.

But the distinguished marksman from Massachusetts, after clearly demonstrating that the action of the Attorney General had saved to the American people some $900,000,000, then undertakes to tell that official how he should have handled the situation.

In telling the Attorney General how he "had left undone those things which he ought to have done, and had done those things which he ought not to have done," he uses this language:

Under the law his right is restricted to confidential advice to his agent, the United States attorney, and prosecutions before a judge or jury. For the Attorney General to fix or concur in a maximum price and use this price as prima facie evidence where prices are charged in excess of that price would give him the power of saying before a trial that the defendant was guilty, and then compel the defendant to go into court and prove his innocence, which is unthinkable under our present system of government and law.

That he acted illegally in agreeing to or concurring in a maximum price for Louisiana sugar without having taken any case before a judge or jury or even started prosecutions and having consulted as to price with the very parties in interest—the Louisiana sugar producers—is shown by the following facts—

And so forth.

According, therefore, to the gentleman from Massachusetts, it was not the duty of the Attorney General to first ascertain whether or not any profiteering in sugar existed before instituting criminal proceedings, but it was his duty to arrest the sugar producers of Louisiana, bring them before a court, and have a jury determine whether or not they were profiteers.

In other words, the Attorney General should have proceeded on the assumption that the several hundred sugar producers in the State of Louisiana were guilty of profiteering, and, guilty or innocent, should have been tried by a jury.

This is a drastic remedy, indeed, and one which I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts would not recommend in the case of the shoe manufacturers in his own district, who are now selling shoes for four times as high as they did before the war.

To charge a man with the violation of the laws of his country is, to my mind, a very serious thing, and it is not my conception of the duties of a prosecuting officer that he should institute criminal proceedings unless there exist a strong presumption of guilt.

Unlike the gentleman from Massachusetts, I conceive and believe it to be the duty of a prosecuting officer to first make a careful investigation in all cases, and if from this investigation he becomes convinced that there has been no violation of the law, it is not his duty to prosecute.

But suppose the Attorney General had taken the advice of my friend, what would have been the result?

The sugar crop in Louisiana was only one-third of a crop and was by no means uniform. In some sections of my district there was only 10 per cent of a crop, while in other sections there was 50 per cent of a crop, so that one producer could have made no profit if he sold his sugar at 30 cents per pound, while another would have made some profit by selling at the same figure.

As a result, the only method of determining the guilty, other than that followed by the Attorney General, would have been to follow the advice of the gentleman from Massachusetts; that is to say, arrest and try them all, which would have resulted in acquitting one man and sending his neighbor to jail for having sold sugar at one and the same figure.

Under these circumstances, what was the Attorney General to do? Personally I do not believe that he had the legal right to in any way interfere with the sale of sugar, as all agricultural products are exempted under the provisions of the Lever Act, and sugar, in my opinion, is an agricultural product.

But in this the Attorney General did not agree with me, he having taken the position that sugar was a manufactured product.

Entertaining this opinion, I repeat, what was he to do under existing circumstances and conditions?

He did what any other sensible Attorney General would have done. He ordered the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana to institute an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether any profiteering in sugar was in contemplation, and to prevent it, if possible, even though it became necessary to institute criminal proceedings.

Acting upon the advice of his superior, the United States district attorney called into conference two ex-United States Senators from Louisiana, neither one of whom were interested in the production of sugar, and the integrity of whom has never been questioned. Ex-Senators Murphy J. Foster and Walter Guion advised and conferred with the district attorney, and they in turn conferred with the producers.

The producers insisted upon an open market, as they were being offered fancy prices for their sugars, but finding that the Department of Justice would not agree to this, they then consented to lay facts and figures before the district attorney and his advisers for the purpose of seeing whether or not a price could be agreed upon which would clearly acquit the producers of any profiteering and beyond which the producers would not sell.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Just a brief one, as I desire to get through in the time allotted to me if possible.

Mr. LAYTON. It seems to me that the whole question is evaded. It is not a question of how much shoes cost in Massachusetts; it is not a question at all of that sort. I could raise the same question for Delaware tomatoes, where there was a failure in my State last year, but there is no law on the statute books that enables the President of the United States to compensate the tomato grower of Delaware or to regulate the price of shoes in Massachusetts, but there was a law on the statute books——

Mr. MARTIN. I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. LAYTON. I know the gentleman can not——

Mr. MARTIN. But I want to say this to the gentleman, that the Louisiana sugar producers were not compensated. If the Louisiana producers had been let alone they would have gotten from 25 cents to 27 cents a pound for their sugar——

Mr. LAYTON. Not if the President had bought the Cuban crop.

Mr. MARTIN. This resolution is not directed against the President; it is a charge against the Attorney General.

Mr. LAYTON. Where the President and the Attorney General must act together under that law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MARTIN. After several days the price of 17 cents for clarified and 18 cents for plantation granulated sugars was agreed upon, and the United States district attorney having notified the Attorney General of the result of this conference, the latter official thereupon sent the district attorney the following wire:

MOONEY,

United States Attorney, New Orleans, La.:

Your wire of the 8th, detailing results of conference, consider agreed price rather high, but hereby concur in maximum fixed price of 17 cents for Louisiana plantation clarifieds, 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated. Understanding that all contracts for a higher figure to be abrogated. Further suggest, if possible, you secure an agreement in writing by authorized committee of Louisiana producers and refiners to be used as prima facie evidence where prices are charged in excess of agreement. You are hereby instructed to immediately prosecute any violator of this agreed price.

PALMER.

This telegram was sent by the Attorney General only after he had been convinced from the investigation made by the United States district attorney that no producer in Louisiana could be convicted of profiteering who sold under these figures.

As a result of this agreement many of the producers abrogated and canceled contracts by which they would have secured a much higher price for their sugars. They conformed in every way with the promise made the United States district attorney, and many of them lost considerable money by so doing.

These are the facts in connection with the sale of Louisiana sugars during the past season, facts which the Attorney General admits and sets forth in answer to House resolution No. 394, facts which are shown by the RECORD, and facts with which the gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely familiar, and facts which make this proposed investigation unnecessary and a waste of time and money.

If the Attorney General acted illegally in failing to arrest and imprison several hundred sugar producers who were guilty of violating no law and who voluntarily agreed to sell their sugars at much less than the market price, and if he acted illegally in saving the consumer from paying from 25 to 30 cents a pound for his sugar, then, of course, he merits the attack that has been made upon him by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but whether he be entitled to praise or censure, the record has been made up, and nothing can be gained by instituting this investigation save and except to give the gentleman from Massachusetts the publicity and notoriety that he has been seeking in this matter.

The gentleman from Massachusetts belongs to a great party, but until a vote is taken on this resolution I can not be convinced that the Republican Members of this House will vote to pass a resolution that is unnecessary, uncalled for, and is prompted by a spirit of political enmity, coupled with the desire of the gentleman from Massachusetts to see his name on the front pages of some of our great metropolitan newspapers.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would just as soon use some time, but I thought possibly the gentleman had a short speech.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly, if the gentleman desires to proceed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will use some time. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, at the end of my remarks I shall reply to the dignified and genial Representative from Louisiana.

The resolution before the House calls for an inquiry and investigation before the Committee on the Judiciary.

The subject matter to be investigated is the admitted concurrence of the Attorney General in a maximum, agreed, or fixed price of 17 cents for Louisiana clarified sugar at the plantation, and of 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated sugar at the plantation, made in a telegram dated November 8 last and sent to the United States attorney at New Orleans, La.

Also whether directly or indirectly immunity from prosecutions under the statutes against profiteering in any way was given by the Attorney General to Louisiana sugar growers or others in the sugar traffic in Louisiana by this action.

The committee is directed to report its conclusions, together with such recommendations as it may deem proper and desirable to submit.

There is no question, as subsequently will be proved, that the Attorney General had no legal authority to fix, agree to, assent, or concur in a fixed price for Louisiana sugar, nor had he legal authority to concur in a fixed price for sugar and use that fixed price as prima facie evidence in a criminal prosecution for profiteering.

Under this investigation and what may flow from it is involved one of the great fundamental principles of American government, namely, the principle which asserts that "the legislative department shall never exercise executive or judicial powers or either of them, the executive shall never exercise legislative or judicial powers or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise legislative or executive powers or either of them, to the end that it may be a government of laws and not of men."

The decision made by the Committee on the Judiciary under this order of investigation will determine the question of whether our Government is a government of laws and not of men.

The passage of this resolution will serve notice upon the Department of Justice that law and order can not be sunk without a trace.

The Attorney General has recently stated that the increased cost of living, in part, has been chargeable to lack of cooperation between the legislative and executive departments.

The passage of this resolution will serve notice to the American people that not only is there no cooperation between the legislative and executive departments in relation to illegal executive price fixing which has led to increased cost of living through the increased price of sugar of hundreds of millions of dollars but that there is complete antagonism between the two departments.

Certain interrogatories were submitted to the Department of Justice under a resolution of the House of Representatives dated December 18, 1918.

Interrogatory 1 asked categorically whether the Attorney General had made, assented to, or approved in any way of the price of 17 cents for Louisiana clarified sugar at the plantation and 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated sugar at the plantation. The answer of the Attorney General to that was evasive, equivocal, and irresponsive, for he said:

> As to paragraph 1, I beg to state I neither made, assented to, nor approved the price of Louisiana sugar on the plantation of 17 cents and 18 cents.

But he left out the important words "in any way." In reply to the second interrogatory, which was the gist, which was the gravamen of these interrogatories, namely, upon what authority of law he had so acted, his reply was:

> As to paragraph 2, in view of my answer to paragraph 1, I deem no further answer necessary.

If that is not equivocation and evasion, not only equivocation and evasion but confession, because had he authority he would have disclosed it, then I do not know the character, the substance, nor the spirit of equivocation or evasion or confession. At the end of the interrogatories the Attorney General says:

> These telegrams do not at all mean that we fixed the price, but do mean that under all the special circumstances existing as to the Louisiana crop this department was willing to concede the prosecution would be ineffectual and unsuccessful if based upon a contention that any price less than 17 cents per pound for yellow clarified and 18 cents per pound for plantation granulated was an "excessive price" under the Lever law.

But this statement is thoroughly disingenuous, as the Attorney General had no right to concede that prosecutions would be ineffectual and unsuccessful and announce that decision to the parties in interest, the Louisiana sugar producers, who had been a party to the price set, agreed upon, or concurred in, and against no one of whom any legal proceedings had been taken.

If the Attorney General had power without legal proceedings of any character and without making an appeal to a judge or jury to fix a price for any commodity bought or sold in these broad United States, he could at the Department of Justice by executive action alone control the entire commerce, the trade, and the property in these broad United States. Congress never has and never will give such power to any man or set of men.

Whether he has authority or not, and whether he had authority to do this thing which is challenged, will be disclosed by any authoritative statement of the law by the investigating committee, and is disclosed in part by a statement made by him which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 5, page 213, in relation to the powers of his office; also by a statement made before the subcommittee of the Agricultural Committee of the Senate by special Assistant Attorney General Figg, October 3 last, page 72, when a statement was made by his assistant that there was no such power, and finally his own statements made before the Agricultural Committee of the House, August 20, pages 78 to 85, when the law under which he is supposed to have acted was being framed. At that time, at great length, he stated he did not want the executive power of fixing the price nor should that be an executive function; that for the Government to make a prima facie case would be contrary to our laws and contrary to justice, because a prosecuting officer having fixed what was guilt by a prima facie case put the defendant on the proof of his innocence.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is there any single point you can find out under this resolution that you do not know already?

Mr. TINKHAM. I want what are to-day mere assertions of mine to become proved, exact, and convincing facts. Perhaps the Attorney General may prove that I am wrong, and he surely should be given the opportunity. I know well and pleasantly the Attorney General, and I want to give him every courtesy, but we are dealing in this matter entirely with public acts and public affairs. I want to be fair, and if I may be permitted, with due modesty, say that my natural inclination is to be far from censorious and always tolerant.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Can you conceive of anything that you do not already know that you want to find out?

Mr. TINKHAM. Far be it from me to maintain or pretend to have complete knowledge of any subject, nor should I think of possessing entire knowledge of this subject, although I have studied it closely.

In relation to the remarks of the honorable Representative from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN], I think I should make some observations. Before making these observations, however, I want again to point out that the question involved in the resolution of investigation is the legality of the action of the Attorney General. That is the principal point around which relevant debate should alone circle.

The honorable Representative from Louisiana stated that Louisiana sugar producers could have sold their sugar in November at 26 cents. I will assume that they could have sold at this price and without profiteering. I will assume that these facts are true, and I will say that when the Attorney General sent the message to Louisiana which said that they could sell their sugar at only 17 or 18 cents he was exercising tyrannous control, and I believe illegal control, over them. If without profiteering they could have sold at this price, they never should have been intimidated by the Attorney General nor should the honorable Representative from Louisiana have ever agreed to any law which would have prevented their obtaining a fair return upon their commodity or agreed to any action of the Attorney General which would have prevented them from receiving an honest profit.

Mr. MARTIN. Admitting that your statement is true, did the action of the Attorney General save money to the American people or lose money for them?

Mr. TINKHAM. In my opinion, the action of the Attorney General cost or lost, as you want to put it, hundreds of millions of dollars to the American people, as the following figures will prove:

The total sugar consumption of the United States for 1919 was 4,555,792 short tons. Of this amount 2,315,097 short tons came from Cuba. The latest estimate of the Department of Agriculture for the 1920 Louisiana crop is 115,585 short tons, or about 2½ per cent of the total consumption of sugar in the United States for 1919, and about 5½ per cent of the total amount of Cuban sugar consumed in the United States based upon the amount of sugar consumed last year.

The value of the Cuban crop on the 1919 figures would be at 18 cents, $833,634,920. The value of the Louisiana crop, at 18 cents, would be on the 1920 estimated production $41,612,242.

Every 2-cent increase per pound in the cost of Cuban sugar would make an additional cost of the American consumer per annum of $92,603,880 in this actual Cuban sugar, but as the price of Cuban sugar sets the price of the American sugar market every 2-cent increase in the cost of all sugar used in the United States would be an additional cost to the American consumer of over $180,000,000 per annum.

Every 2-cent increase in the cost of Louisiana sugar would make an additional cost to the American consumer of $4,623,580, so that if the Louisiana crop was sold at 18 cents instead of 26 cents per pound at the plantation there would be a saving of $18,494,320, but if the Cuban crop advanced 2 cents it would make an additional cost of sugar per annum to the American consumer of over $180,000,000, and if the increased cost was 10 cents it would make an additional cost of sugar to the American consumer of over $900,000,000.

And when the Attorney General fixed the price on that 2½ per cent or 5½ per cent of sugar, although the effect might have been to save the difference in cost of this small amount to the American people, the Cuban producers immediately accepted the price as an official American price, and they attempted to put their price on a par. This is what the Attorney General accomplished. Any reasonable man must assume that this would have been the effect upon the Cuban market; that it must have stimulated to an unusual degree the Cuban producers; and that this was the effect, we have a statement from the highest authority in America, George Zabriskie, head of the Sugar Equalization Board, the Government controller of sugar during 1919. He has said:

> The sugar situation is now hopeless, for the reason that it has got into politics, and the sooner it gets out the better. The ridiculous price of 17 cents wholesale for the raw sugar now charged by the Louisiana planters is an outrage. I can't say that Attorney General Palmer fixed the price, but it was known in Louisiana that he would stand for it.
> It was known, furthermore, that he approved it. It was this folly that inspired the Cubans to make their gouge. When they saw American sugar planters getting away with 17 cents they decided it was perfectly legitimate for them to get some of the plunder, and to-day the people are paying the price for the Attorney General's mistake.
> Had the Sugar Equalization Board been permitted to exercise its own judgment, instead of the country facing a famine, as it now does, we would have had the largest crop of sugar in history at 6½ cents per pound.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TINKHAM. May I have two more minutes?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. TINKHAM. So by the action of the Attorney General there was no saving, but a tremendous increased cost placed upon America and the cost of living to the American people.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. For a very short question.

Mr. MARTIN. I will make it short. If the sale of Louisiana sugar at 17 and 18 cents influenced the Cuban market to such an extent, what would it have been if Louisiana sugar had sold at 26 or 27 cents?

Mr. TINKHAM. Without Government approval and action, probably no effect. The small supply in Louisiana would have been undoubtedly absorbed unnoticed, but with Government approval and action to which wide publicity was given there was and must have been tremendous effect in Cuba and elsewhere.

Mr. MARTIN. Why?

Mr. TINKHAM. Because the Government had said what the price of sugar was in the United States by the action of the Attorney General. [Applause.] The honorable Representative from Louisiana stated that I desire to have people prosecuted; that I did not want them or their case given a fair hearing. That does not fairly represent my views. The Louisiana producers should have had their case fully investigated, and if they were not profiteering by selling sugar at 26 cents, then they should have been allowed to have sold it at that price. I understand that is the claim of the honorable Representative from Louisiana, and, as I have stated before, I do not think he protected the interests of his constituents when he allowed the Attorney General to exercise what I have denominated as tyranny.

The Attorney General should only have done in this case, as in all cases, what was legal, and his only legal right is to prosecute those who in all fairness he can say after an investigation are making an unfair profit.

I am sorry that the honorable Representative from Louisiana has charged me with either cheap or sordid motives. He has said that in presenting this resolution I was merely looking for notoriety and publicity. I think when it is brought to his attention that June 30 last I introduced in this House a resolution of investigation in relation to the sugar problem and the then promised scarcity and high price, and have systematically since been pursuing the subject, that he should withdraw his remarks.

This resolution should be passed, in order that we may assert again that this is a Government of laws and not of men, that some of the responsibility for the increased cost of living in the United States may be judicially determined, and that the laws as passed by the representatives of the people shall remain supreme in their dignity and in their application. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I suppose it is scarcely necessary for me to assert that I hold no brief for the Attorney General of the United States, and to some it may be surprising that I, in any way, attempt to speak in his behalf. In fact, it might be, by some, expected that I would take a different course upon this floor. But I hope to be now, and I desire always to be, broad enough to forget the personality of the individual, and to regard the individual simply as a public officer. Therefore, when the honor and the integrity, the good faith and the honesty, of the legal adviser of the President of the United States is attacked in the outrageous manner that this resolution makes it, and in the maner that was exhibited by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], I, as a Representative in this Congress, and particularly as a Representative from Pennsylvnia, from which State the Attorney General hails, deem it my duty to enter a word of protest. I would not attempt either to condone or excuse the conduct of any official in the Government, if I believed that that conduct was worthy of condemnation. And if the proof in this case, or if even the prima facie allegations in this case were such as to establish a case upon the merits thereof, demanding an investigation of this kind as set forth in the resolution, I would be the first party, regardless of the fact that the Attorney General comes from Pennsylvania, to forward such a movement and to vote for such a resolution.

I heard the remarkable statement made here by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that the Attorney General should be haled to the criminal bar, and that if he were haled to the criminal bar he did not see, as a criminal attorney with a very large practice heretofore, how the Attorney General could escape punishment except by a quashing of the indictment or perhaps by a plea of non vult contendere. Now, right there I beg to differ from the gentleman from Kansas. It reminds me of a case I had in my county at one time, where a criminal had no one to represent him, and the court assigned a young attorney to act for him, and the prisoner at the bar looked at the court and said, "Is that my lawyer?" The judge said, "Yes; he will represent you in this case." And the prisoner said, "Then I had better plead guilty at once." [Laughter.]

Of course, if the gentleman from Kansas was the attorney defending the Attorney General of the United States, his political prejudice, and possibly his desire to do damage to the administration and to the Attorney General himself, would almost compel the defendant, the Attorney General, either to plead guilty or else to plead non vult on the ground that his attorney was incapable of defending him or would not give him a fair chance. The truth of this matter is just here: This is not only an attack upon the Attorney General; it is an attack upon the administraion.

Now, what is the phrasing of this resolution? Let us get down to it. First, it charges "the admitted concurrence of the Attorney General in a maximum, agreed, or fixed price of 17 cents for Louisiana clarified sugar." The Attorney General does not in substance deny that. The Attorney General says he never agreed to such price, but he did say and does say, and I suppose holds the position now, that after consultation with his law officer in the district in which these gentlemen live who manufacture this sugar, he became convinced, under all the circumstances, that 17 and 18 cents was a fair price for sugar, and therefore he conceded that if no more than that price was charged, then what followed? That the charge of profiteering could not be made out, and that prosecutions would not be warranted under the act.

Now, that is all he says. Did he exceed his authority in so doing? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] says he did. Right there I beg leave to differ with him. I happened to be at one time district attorney of the county in which I live. It was my privilege under the law—it was not only my privilege under the law it was by duty as prosecuting attorney—to represent not only the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, but to represent as well the defendant, because that is the business of the prosecuting attorney. He represents in fairness and justice not only the Commonwealth, but he represents also the defendant, in so far as he must see to it that the defendant has a fair trial. Therefore as the attorney representing the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as district attorney in Lehigh County, it was my duty often to say to the grand jury, "There is not sufficient evidence here to warrant the finding of a bill."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the honorable Representative from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. Not now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DEWALT. And it was my duty oftentimes before a jury, after all the evidence was in, to say to that jury, "Gentlemen of the jury, there is not sufficient evidence here to warrant my asking you for a conviction."

Now, what the Attorney General did say was this:

> Under the circumstances now existing, with a short sugar crop, only 40 per cent of the usual crop; with the demand for sugar ever incessant and ever increasing, with the fact that there has been a loss in Louisiana to these producers heretofore, with the fact that sugar is now commanding from 20 to 27 cents a pound, I concede under the law and the fact existing that the price of 17 or 18 cents can be legally obtained by these people, and if prosecuted the prosecutions will in all probability be fruitless.

That is in substance what he said.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TINKHAM. Is the honorable Representative from Pennsylvania aware of the fact that there were no court proceedings, no grand jury proceedings, no action taken by the Attorney General in any way before this agreement was made and a prima facie case set up?

Mr. DEWALT. All the better. Then he saved the expense of fruitless trial by notifying the people at once that they had not the right but they had the privilege of charging a fair price and a maximum price.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. This was after a fair investigation?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; after a fair investigation.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the honorable Representative from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Not now; but I will yield to the gentleman in just a moment. I am always glad to hear from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Now, another matter is referred to in the resolution:

> Whether directly or indirectly, immunity from prosecution under the statutes against profiteering in any way was given to Louisiana sugar growers or others in the sugar traffic in Louisiana.

That is answered in the same way. He did not grant immunity to them because he could not grant immunity. As the gentleman from Massachusetts says, there were no prosecutions pending. If there were no prosecutions pending, then there was no immunity to be granted. If no oaths or affirmations were made by which people were to be haled into court, then immunity was fruitless, because there was no necessity for it; and, secondly, immunity goes so far, if you please, as this, that if the price of 17 or 18 cents, under the circumstances, was a fair and legitimate price for them to charge, profiteering being a matter of fact and not a matter of law, and to be proved by the weight of the evidence—if 17 or 18 cents was a fair price under the circumstances, immunity was not necessary at all.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Did these same people ever charge 17 or 18 cents before for sugar?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not answer that.

Mr. KEARNS. Has there ever been a shortage of sugar before?

Mr. DEWALT. I am only relying on the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana, who said that there is at the present time and was at the time when this order was made.

Mr. KEARNS. There has been very often in the last 25 years a sugar shortage, has there not?

Mr. DEWALT. I understand so.

Mr. KEARNS. And in those years of shortage these same men had never charged 17 or 18 cents a pound for sugar. Why charge it now?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not answer that question, for the simple reason that I do not know the circumstances of the case.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I understood the gentleman from Louisiana, he said that at the very time this was done many sugar planters had sugar sold at 20 to 25 cents.

Mr. DEWALT. From 20 to 27 cents; yes; and that was at the time when the order was made.

Then they ask in this resolution:

> Third. The facts and the authority of law, if any, upon which the Attorney General or his representatives or agents fixed, agreed, or concurred in the price of 17 cents for Louisiana clarified sugar at the plantation and of 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated sugar at the plantation, and how such facts were obtained.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] and the proponents of this resolution did not have the facts at this time, then why this long tirade that we had here the other day and this vituperation that we have heard here of the Attorney General from the gentleman from Massachusetts? Why this array of figures? Why this condensation, if you please, of a mass of facts presented in the RECORD? Is this mere hearsay, or is it what the gentleman alleges it to be, the truth? If it is the truth, then he has all the facts; and if he desires to know the law, let him observe this one thing: That all men are presumed to know the law. It may be a violent presumption in regard to some, but if the gentleman desires to know by what law he proceeded, the statute books are open to him.

The Attorney General is not called upon at any time to present to the House of Representatives his legal authority to do a certain thing. I grant you that the facts might be a subject for investigation. I grant you that if there had been an unlawful violation of his power, then he would be subject to criticism and possibly to punishment. But where lies the remedy? Does it lie in one of these investigations of which we have heard so much, one of these long continued and ever drawn-out investigations, made and instigated by the majority party here, and which up to this time have been entirely fruitless except in the expenditure of thousands and thousands of dollars? Is this, in brief, just another exhibition of the continued attempt to do harm to the administration of President Wilson, with the Attorney General singled out at this time as the particular victim, or is it an honest attempt to obtain information in an honest way? If it be the latter, then I refer these gentlemen first to the statutes defining the law as it is; second, to the facts as they have them now; and third and more particularly, to the facts as presented by the gentleman from Louisiana in regard to sugar production at this time.

Now, that is the gist of this resolution. I have tried to discuss its features seriatim. What would be the effect of this? The effect would be to hale the Attorney General before the Committee on the Judiciary or a subcommittee thereof, and then they would report back upon what? Upon the price of sugar, I suppose, as then existing, and upon the necessity for that price, and secondly as to whether or not the Attorney General concurred in a fair price. He certainly had the right to say under the law that if they charged no more than a reasonable price he would not prosecute them. There is no doubt about that in any legal mind. Third, the investigation is to cover the question, By what authority of law did he do this? For that I beg leave to refer the gentleman, as I have said before, to the statutes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the honorable Representative from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TINKHAM. If the Attorney General agreed on a maximum price for Louisiana sugar as he did in his telegram of November 8, and that was published in Louisiana, could he in fairness or in honor prosecute anyone who sold at that figure or below it? I ask the question because the honorable Representative from Pennsylvania said that the Attorney General by his action did not give immunity.

Mr. DEWALT. There is a difference between giving immunity——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUSTED). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. May I be permitted one minute to answer the question?

Mr. GARRETT. I am exceedingly sorry, but all the time is promised.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended 10 minutes, half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and half by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time be extended 10 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER]. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, there does not seem to be any misunderstanding of the proposition that every home in America to-day is paying about 11 cents a pound more for sugar than it ought to be paying. Now, in this contest between the President and the Attorney General as to who is to blame for that condition I have no preference. I am not prejudiced in favor of either. [Laughter.] There are some facts connected with the matter which lead me to say that I think either of them might legitimately claim credit for being responsible for the extortionate price; but I think it is fair to the minority side of this House in particular, who claim to know so little about this proposition, that a full investigation be had, so that responsibility may be finally fixed.

Last August seven directors of a corporation of which the President of the United States was the sole owner of the stock—seven out of the eight directors—recommended to him that he buy the Cuban sugar crop for a little over 6 cents a pound. One man, who by reason of being a professor, evidently had considerable hearing at the White House, recommended that the Cuban sugar crop be not purchased.

There was no answer to these recommendations that anyone knows of for something like 90 days from the time they were submitted. Some one has said here—and I anticipate he will say it again—that Congress is to blame for this condition. I deny it. This corporation was created by law and had a legal status. The President of the United States was the only stockholder. Seven of his directors made certain recommendations and one of them recommended otherwise. Now you say, Does the failure to purchase that Cuban sugar fully account for the present price of sugar? I think not. I agreed at the time with the distinguished gentleman from the sugar district who spoke here this morning, who said that the fact that there was no answer to these recommendations left the sugar situation up in the air. The fact that the President would not answer one way or the other, that the American sugar refiners could not find out what the Government was going to do, left them all in a condition where they did not know what to do, and neither the independent refiners nor the trust purchased the Cuban sugar, so it was on the market. Why? Because they could not find out what the Government was going to do, what this sugar corporation was going to do, and it hung that way. The Attorney General of the United States did have by law the responsibility for prosecuting profiteers. I am not criticizing him for not prosecuting the men in Louisiana, but he had to have somebody to talk about so that he could get some publicity. He had to pick out somebody and talk about them and get some publicity, and so I suppose he talked about the Louisiana people.

But it would take a blind man not to be able to understand that what he said to the Louisiana sugar producers was fixing the price of sugar and that that was the cause of the Cuban sugar people raising their price. They would have been foolish if they had not. Here was this great country of ours ready to consume their entire product for this year, and the head of the Department of Justice was close to the Chief Executive. There, again, I have no preference between them. I do not care which one of them is nominated. It makes no difference. I do not think it will make any difference, and I do not care a thing about this politically.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. TINCHER. It does not make any difference to me which of these two is held responsible for this, but one of them or the two together are by their conduct responsible for every householder in America having to pay 11 cents a pound more for sugar to-day than he would have had to pay if we had had an economical, fair, honest, business administration of our affairs. [Applause.] You can not lay that onto Congress. We came here in December and at the request of the administration we extended the powers of this corporation for another year. That was in December, after they had waited 90 days for an answer to the recommendations of the seven directors of this corporation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS]. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, it is just as apparent as anything in the world that there is no politics whatever in this resolution. [Laughter.] And if anyone had a suspicion that there was any politics in it, that suspicion would have been dissipated when he listened to the gentleman from Kansas who has just taken his seat and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] who opened the debate.

The gentleman from Kansas who has just taken his seat made a speech which had absolutely nothing to do with the resolution before the House. He spoke of the failure to buy the Cuban crop last August and September, and yet a reading of the resolution before us fails to show any section relative to the failure to buy the Cuban sugar crop last August or September.

The resolution that is now before us is to investigate the Attorney General because the sugar planters of Louisiana obtained 17 cents for their plantation yellow clarified and 18 cents for their plantation granulated. That is all that is in the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a single fact in connection with the sale of the sugar crop of Louisiana but what is perfectly well known to the introducer of this resolution and to every Member of the House. In answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] admitted that he knew nothing that could be brought out by this investigation. It looks to me as if they are shooting in the dark, hoping and trusting to luck.

Mr. Speaker, what can be gained by this investigation? What addition to the sum of human knowledge does the gentleman from Massachusetts expect to get? The sugar planters of Louisiana have sold their crop. They perhaps raised enough this year to last the American people one week. There is no doubt in any man's mind but what 17 and 18 cents a pound, under the conditions that prevailed, was a low price. There is no question but what many of the Louisiana planters had contracted to sell their crop for more than this price, and yet when the price was agreed on they patriotically gave up the surplus and sold the crop at the price of 17 and 18 cents.

This investigation is asked for by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Well, if we are going to investigate the high cost of things, perchance the very first investigation might take us to New England. Unfortunately, I not only consume a certain amount of sugar but I have to wear a certain number of pairs of shoes at the same time. The price of sugar has not made the same advance in the market as has the price of shoes. I am also compelled, like all the rest of the people in the United States, to wear cotton goods, and yet the other day, before a committee, a gentleman from New England—from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON—stated that cotton textiles had gone up 600 per cent since the war, and that such a price was absolutely unjustifiable, considering the price paid for raw cotton and considering the increase paid to labor.

Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as if two prevailing factors have influenced the gentleman who introduced the resolution and the gentlemen who have spoken therefor. One is that this sugar is grown way down South in Louisiana. I was born and raised in that sugar belt, Mr. Speaker, and I distinctly remember how every four years prominent Republicans came down there and how they told the people of that section that they were the only friends that the Louisiana sugar planters had in American politics; and yet that side of the House, having as much time as this side of the House, has not said a word in defense of the sugar industry of Louisiana, that they are so prone to come down and defend in political years before the people who grow the cane. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Perchance another reason why this investigation is asked for is the personality of the Attorney General himself. Everyone in this Chamber knows that the Sugar Equalization Board has asked this Congress since early in the session for additional powers to handle the sugar situation of America, and that side of the aisle has been in control of this Congress, and nothing has been done. But the Attorney General is looming somewhat prominently in the public eye. Perchance they think by this investigation, being absolutely nonpolitical, that they may lessen his popularity.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the honorable Representative from Louisiana yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I decline to yield, because it is a dangerous thing, I would remind the gentleman from Massachusetts—it is a dangerous thing for a man to get a hobby. I have noticed in the last several months that the hobby of the gentleman from Massachusetts is sugar. There is not a pound of it raised in the gentleman's section, but I have listened with ear intent for the gentleman from Massachusetts to raise his voice on this floor denouncing some of the alleged profiteering that is being indulged in by the manufacturers of New England, and yet not a word have we heard coming from him on shoes or clothing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not a word do I expect to hear from him. Denounce the sugar people, denounce them because they raise a crop which goes to the very life of our people; denounce them, if you please, because they have got 17 and 18 cents for a crop which it is admitted cost them that much to make, but not a word of condemnation for the people in his own section who have profiteered not 100, 200, 300, 400, or 500, but according to the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut

[Mr. TILSON], even 600 per cent upon all the people of America in textile goods which they manufacture. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, there is nothing sectional in this investigation; there is nothing political in this investigation; there is nothing against the Attorney General! It is purely in the interest of the public!

Mr. Speaker, I want to close with this statement: This is an investigation uncalled for, unwarranted, and, with the great problems pressing this Congress, it is a shame and a disgrace to take up the time of the Congress over such a matter. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was very much impressed by the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS], who just preceded me, when he made the assertion that the manufacturers in New England had profiteered 100, 200, and even 300 per cent in the past. I believe he even said as high as 600 per cent. I want to ask the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House, if that is true, what has your Attorney General been doing with the million dollars that we gave him last year? Why has not he prosecuted some of these men whom you say have profiteered? [Applause on Republican side.] He has not sent one single man to the penitentiary. He has not made a single investigation that ever resulted in prosecution, unless it was some little innocent retailer in some little country village. His investigations have produced nothing but unrest and discontent among the public. He either does not want to go after this proposition fairly and squarely or else he is not sincere when he says that he is going after it to see if they are profiteering, and to cut the cost of living. Every single heralded investigation has ended in a farce and fiasco. The Attorney General has always preceded said investigations by announcements in the papers, accompanied by his photograph, as to how he was intending to investigate such a concern and thereby lower the cost of living. Such a grandstand entrance was made in Chicago a few weeks ago. Results? If the newspaper accounts are to be believed, the exit out of that great city was not of the brass-band variety, but rather a hurried exit quietly several hours ahead of time. These same newspaper accounts recite how the distinguished Attorney General was furnished by the good men and women of Chicago with hundreds of cases of profiteering, but his reply was, "We can not handle every little complaint; that must be taken up with your local officials." The main object of this much advertised effort of the administration to lower living costs seems to me to be a surreptitious effort of certain men to get a bit of advertising at Government expense. In that—and that only—have they succeeded, so it appears to us. How much good that advertising will do them remains to be seen, but I, for one, am tired of appropriating money to further an individual's campaign.

Some good will come out of this investigation, if it is nothing else than to centralize and focus the attention of the public upon the fact that the President of the United States with his chief law officer, the Attorney General, in all of their statements, which they have been publishing in the newspapers from time to time, about the steps they were going to take to lower the cost of living have not been able to accomplish anything. It will focus the attention of the public upon the fact that they can not or else will not, one of the two. So far as the matter of sugar in Louisiana is concerned, or in any other State where it is produced, I do not know whether 17 cents is too much or too little, nor do I care, but I do know that whenever the Government has undertaken to control the price, whether sugar, coal, or any other necessity, two things happen; one is, the price to the consumer goes up and dissatisfaction and unrest have followed. Business has been disrupted and uncertainty always present. This uncertainty of what the Government would do has compelled the producers to add an extra charge to the product in order to protect themselves from some freak move of the administration.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Then the wheat farmer, when he gets $2.26, gets $1 more than he is entitled to?

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman well knows the farmer did not get $1 per bushel more than he should, but, on the contrary, received much less than he would have if the Government had not interfered. Can the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] say as much for the farmers in his section of the United States? Your arguments for the sugar producers if applied to the farmers would give them $4 per bushel. Why not be fair and let the law of supply and demand control the prices of commodities of life? Wyoming had a failure of the wheat crop this year. Did the Attorney General say that a fair price would be $4 a bushel for Wyoming wheat because Wyoming had this failure? He did not. Is it possible that presidential ambitions had anything to do with it? It seems to me that it is about time for the Government of the United States to withdraw from the field of private business.

This Congress can do nothing better than to let the public know that we are going to stop making laws for the regulation of people's private industry; then industry will flourish and the confidence of the people will again be restored; and if we do this, you will find that you can buy the commodities that you wish cheaper and that I can buy the commodities that I wish cheaper than we can buy them under this Government interference in private affairs.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Then, under the gentleman's theory, if the Attorney General undertook to investigate the New England profiteers, he would encounter the opposition of the gentleman from Ohio, because he would be digging into private business.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman is entirely wrong, and he knows he is wrong when he makes that kind of a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to review the conduct of the Attorney General and would say nothing except for the attack upon the President by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. The gentleman has seen proper to go back of any of the activities of the Attorney General and to arraign the President. Now, these are the facts, which I wish to state, subject to correction by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], who has made a long study of the subject that we are considering:

First. The President was never by any specific legislation commanded or advised to purchase sugar anywhere or to any extent. His power to do anything of that kind was and could only be inferred from a general appropriation provision placing a large fund under his control for emergency purposes. Exercising that power, he organized the Sugar Equalization Board, his own agency, through which he purchased the Cuban crop in 1918 before the armistice was signed, when there was confessedly an emergency.

Second. Early in 1919 there were those who became anxious lest there should be a shortage of sugar and a sharp advance in price. It was this anxiety that led to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] introducing a resolution of inquiry on June 30, 1919, which was reported to the House August 5; but when the resolution came to be considered on September 15, and the gentleman from Massachusetts tried to secure its approval, there was objection raised to it by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who assisted in a successful effort to block its passage. Alarmed by the information I was then receiving from various sources, I cooperated with the gentleman from Massachusetts in his effort, hoping that action might be taken which would guard the supply of sugar and limit the prices.

Third. It is true that the Equalization Board, in the summer of 1919, with the exception of Mr. Taussig, recommended to the President the purchase of the Cuban crop. It is also true that, following that recommendation, there was no statement or intimation that the President, the general emergency having then passed, would undertake the purchase of the Cuban crop. There was no one in Congress who could assume or who was entitled to assume that he would do so. There was no one in Congress or elsewhere who could not have ascertained that he would not, or in all probability would not, do so.

Fourth. The Cuban crop could have been bought at a low price in the summer and early fall of 1919 when the matter was talked about in this House and when there was a hearing before a Senate committee. At any time Congress, possessing unlimited power, could have acted and brought about the purchase, but it failed to act, and the theory now is that the President must alone have the responsibility. That theory can not be justified unless it is taken for granted that this Congress was sent here to occupy a purely inactive attitude and not deal in a comprehensive manner with this or any great problem until after the acute political condition has ceased and the presidential election has been held. By assuming that position it is impossible that Congress can escape responsibility for the enormous burden that the increased price of sugar has placed upon the consumers. This proposition we will submit to the public without misgiving as to what the decision will be.

Mr. TINKHAM. May I ask the honorable Representative a question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does the honorable Representative from Virginia think it is quite fair for me to be charged with either political motives or publicity motives in relation to this special resolution before the House when I started the wheels of legislation with my feeble efforts June 30 in relation to this subject?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am making no charge of that character; but if the gentleman's leader had not blocked him, as I have stated, we would perhaps not face the prospect of a burden of a billion dollars being placed upon the sugar consumers of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, we have just been advised through the animated and agitated discourses of the two gentlemen from Kansas of the correct answer to the old, oft-repeated query, "What is the matter with Kansas?" We have also had the fourth, fifth, or sixth prepared statement of the honorable Representative from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] The honorable Representative began his crusade on sugar as early as last October, I believe.

Mr. TINKHAM. June.

Mr. GARD. Well, some time ago. At any rate, some eight months ago. He secured the submission of his favorite topic of sugar for publicity purposes to the Federal Trade Commission for investigation. He has not advised us of the proceedings there or of any report. At the same time there was mysteriously wafted to the press, the gentleman of the great fourth estate, specified charges and reasons, as made by the honorable Representative from Massachusetts, carefully prepared and ready for publication, before his charges were made upon this floor. Now he is pursuing this same thing, which has gotten to be an obsession with my friend until now we have this very remarkable resolution; and I have to say that, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I know that the committee has much more important business before it, unreported and unconsidered, than this resolution. He states that he is interested in knowing whether this is a government of laws or a government of men, and that this is the real purpose of the resolution. Now, that is so entirely academic I do not suppose we should sacrifice the time of the committee and the House to determine it, for he must know that laws are administered by men, and have no power of automatic administration. I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the term-long proponent of this series of resolutions, the implacable enemy of the Attorney General, to a little debate between himself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], wherein is stated in a few very succinct paragraphs the entire truth concerning the gentleman's persistent attacks, through resolution and otherwise.

The first inquiry by the gentleman from Illinois was:

Does the gentleman contend that the Attorney General, who has direction of prosecution under the statutes, is not permitted to say to the district attorneys and others when he will or when he will not prosecute under a certain state of facts?

The honorable Representative from Massachusetts answered:

I do not.

Then the gentleman from Illinois asked:

Does the gentleman consider it to be entirely improper for the Attorney General, having charge of prosecutions, to inform the public when he will not prosecute, thinking there is no violation of the law, and when he will prosecute, thinking there is a violation of the law, in order that the public may know probably whether they are violating or not violating a law by doing a certain thing?

Now, there is the gist of the whole business. It is useless to proceed in an investigation upon theories and unfounded accusations. The Attorney General is an executive officer. It is not alone his power, but it is his duty, to have such control, to have such direction of his district attorneys as is necessary to determine whether under a given proven state of facts his administration will authorize a prosecution or not. I think this resolution is entirely unnecessary, unwarranted, and futile, and should be defeated. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the outcome of the investigation that is proposed, neither during that investigation or at any other time will a more sweeping and damaging indictment be made against the Attorney General of the United States than was made a moment ago by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] who, in attempting to defend the Attorney General, declared that it was notorious that there had been profiteering in certain parts of the country to the extent of 100, 200, 300 per cent and more. This declaration is made in the face of the fact that it is the sworn duty of the Attorney General, under a law passed by Congress and amended by adding a heavy penalty in the first session of this Congress at his suggestion, to prosecute all profiteers. If, as a matter of fact, the situation is as the gentleman from Louisiana has stated it, the Attorney General of the United States has woefully failed in the performance of his duty and is responsible for the continuation of exorbitant prices. Mr. Speaker, the fact is that nothing that has occurred under this administration more strikingly illustrates the failure of the administration to guard the interests of the American people than this sugar situation. Under the law a corporation known as the Sugar Equalization Board was organized, the capital of which was in the name of the President of the United States, and under their authority that board, in the summer of 1918, bought and controlled the Cuban sugar crop, established and fixed prices, and during that year fairly well controlled the situation. In the early summer of 1919 the question arose as to whether the administration under that corporation should continue to control the situation. What was the result? A divided opinion among the officers of the corporation charged with responsibility and the matter placed before the President of the United States, and no action taken by him. He neither followed the advice of the majority of the board that desired to purchase the Cuban crop and control the situation nor did he follow the advice of the single member of the board who advised against buying the Cuban crop. He did nothing. One of two things should have been done. The administration failed to do either. If the Cuban crop was not to be bought in the summer of 1919, then early in that season the board should have abandoned its control of the sugar situation, in the face of a large supply of sugar, in which event the law of supply and demand would have kept the price of sugar reasonably low. But the President failed to advise the control of the situation in the purchase of the Cuban crop and he failed to advise that price fixing be abandoned and the law of supply and demand be allowed to operate for the reduction of the price.

The Attorney General in that situation did the one thing that was certain to increase the price of sugar. He let it be known that there would be no prosecutions for profiteering if a wholesale price of 17½ cents a pound were charged for the unrefined Louisiana sugar crop. The inevitable result of that was to advance the price of sugar far beyond what it would have been if the administration had had no control of the situation whatever and made no pretense at fixing the price. The western beet-sugar growers were perfectly content with a wholesale price of 12½ cents a pound for refined granulated sugar. If, following Prof. Taussig, the administration had declined to buy the Cuban crop last summer and at the same time had gotten out of the sugar situation and left prices to adjust themselves, as Prof. Taussig suggested, prices would not have advanced greatly if at all. But by his act the Attorney General did as a matter of fact virtually fix the price of sugar at upward of 17½ cents per pound. But for this action affecting the price of Louisiana sugar the wholesale price to-day would probably be less than 12½ cents a pound, which the western beet-sugar producer has been glad to take for his sugar crop.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only a moment.

The administration, by the action of the Attorney General's office, did the very thing that was certain to advance the price of sugar 6 or 8 cents a pound above what it probably would have been under the operation of the laws of supply and demand, and by so doing laid upon the American people a burden running into the billions of dollars. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I challenge anyone to find a parallel to this record.

If the Cuban crop had been purchased and the trade regulated, the price of sugar would have been lower than last year.

If it had been announced that the Cuban crop was not to be bought and the trade allowed to operate under natural laws, the result would probably have been the same, but the Cuban crop was not purchased and notice was given that unrefined Louisiana sugar could be sold wholesale at 17½ cents. Result, sugar prices of from 18 to 25 cents retail.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, when my eye fell upon this remarkable resolution and I had absorbed its contents, I confess the thought never entered my mind that it would be taken with any degree of seriousness whatsoever. I had supposed that it was one of those innumerable resolutions that flutter in and flutter out and are gone and forgotten.

But I guess I ought to have known better.

Our early impressions are strong. I came to the Congress many years ago when the Republican Party was in power and when it was the custom to do things, when it followed a magnificent leadership that dealt with serious things in a serious way. And I thought, too, of its conduct while it was in the minority and under the control of a leadership that dealt with serious things in a serious way and threw the trivial aside. Thinking of that, and forgetting the present condition for the moment, I assumed that surely this resolution with its sinister suggestion, with its cowardice partly dissembled but not wholly concealed, this useless thing, this covert attack upon the integrity of the highest law officer of this Government, would not in a serious body of statesmen receive serious consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I should have remembered the present, and then I would not have been so grievously disappointed when on yesterday the Committee on Rules reported out this resolution. I ought to have remembered that the leadership on the Republican side has reached that point where in order to divert attention from its hopeless incapacity and its legislative idiocy it greedily seizes upon anything, however silly it may be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And so we have this resolution. What does it mean and what is it for? For legislative purposes? Admittedly no. For what purpose? To impeach the Attorney General of the United States? If that is the purpose, the brave way to do it, the right way to do it, is for a gentleman to arise and upon his responsibility as a Member of the House of Representatives impeach the Attorney General. I challenge any man of you to take that brave course and put it to the test. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The brilliant Attorney General of the United States, in a long and busy political career, has accumulated a number of enemies, political enemies, when he was a Member of Congress; enemies as Attorney General; enemies while he was the Alien Property Custodian, and these last-mentioned enemies of the Attorney General were also the enemies of his country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, the facts are known here. There is nothing to conceal; nothing has been concealed. The price of sugar, in fact, was reduced from 25 to 40 cents a pound down to 17 or 18 cents by reason of action perfectly legal and wholly proper, taken by the Department of Justice after full and free consultation.

Here in this hour, when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has in his pocket a rule unanimously reported from the Committee on Rules touching a bill unanimously reported from the Committee on Patents, to take up legislation urged by the business men of this country, with this side ready to take it up and legislate, ready to do something—in this hour, with that legislation waiting, we pause in the midst of doing nothing to do something worse. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, there is an intelligence on the Republican side of the House to which I would venture to make an appeal if I could know that the hand that reaches out from that mysterious room labeled "steering committee" could be lifted for a moment from the heads of those on that side and permit them to act upon their own judgment and upon their own intelligence and upon their own conscience in this matter. There is a sense of shame that I could appeal to if the steering committee did not get in the way. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But I suppose the edict has gone forth; that is my information. You must line up and do this silly thing, which not a school child in America who understood the facts and had a proper sense of proportion would think of giving consideration to.

Gentlemen, the power is yours. We shall not upon this side sit quietly by and acquiesce in this ridiculous performance. We can not prevent its passage, but we can at least maintain, so far as we are concerned, that decency of conduct, that order of procedure which, let us hope, will continue to give to the people of the United States some reason to have at least a little respect for the House of Representatives. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I have had some correspondence on the sugar question with the Department of Justice. Having received several complaints on the sugar situation, some of them very serious, and having also received some letters sent out by mercantile houses stating the Government-regulation prices, I thought that it was the proper thing for me to convey to the Department of Justice this correspondence. I did it after consultation with one of the leading Members on the Democratic side, the former chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the belief that this was a question that was sufficiently important to be considered without a political bias, and therefore I sent the correspondence to the Department of Justice and asked the Attorney General to give me the information, that I might give it to the people appealing to me for relief.

I have that correspondence—a letter from the department, not signed by the Attorney General but by one of the men in the Department of Justice who knows most about the sugar situation. My intention was to try to get at, if possible, the real situation in the upward scale of prices, and to do that I went to the source. When unsatisfactory information comes in response to such effort, and a resolution is presented to the Committee on Rules looking to a better and more definite method to get the information, since we are not able to get it directly, we have an arraignment in the form of an assault upon the Congress—that part of it that is controlling Congress to-day—on the basis that we are not doing important things but that we are frittering our time away on unimportant matters. I would rather take the view of the gentleman who is now at the Reporter's desk, Mr. MOORE of Virginia, a distinguished Democrat, who, quite unlike others who have spoken, does see some importance in finding the facts about which many people are suffering.

I now want to say to my Democratic friends that our concern is not so much an attack or an offense on the Attorney General; his reputation is not the only thing nor the most important that is to-day at stake. That is not our purpose, so far as I am concerned; and when any Representative, any responsible Member of the Democratic minority, asserts that the people who buy sugar have no rights in this House to be demanded, but that the man who must be held responsible for the protection of those rights under the laws of their own making must not be criticized because he happens to be unable to secure results, whether from oversight or because he does not exercise his authority, then you and I differ. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The people who use sugar, which comprehends our entire population, have the right to be concerned about an ever-scaling price, still going on up; and when I have a letter like this, which I hold in my hand, showing the quotations for sugar are, "Pure cane, powdered, 21 cents per pound; and 4–X, 21¼; granulated, 20½; clarified, 20; light brown, 18¼," quoted by a wholesale dealer to the retailer, given with this instruction:

These prices are in conformity with the Government regulations and are all net f. o. b. Cincinnati sight-draft bill of lading attached.

It is not frittering time to get at the source.

A Democratic Member who read this statement said to me, "It is an outrage." He urged me to send it at once to the Department of Justice and ask them for an explanation of it.

I did so, and I have here the letter of the Department of Justice, which, as usual, leaves you where it found you.

The Department of Justice has established no fixed prices on sugar.

That probably is an effort to state that the wholesale dealer was not authorized to make the statement that these rates are in conformity to governmental regulations.

Under the food-control act, it is unlawful to make an unreasonable rate or charge in the handling of this necessary. The planter is exempted from the operation of this act, and dealers in Cuba are not under the jurisdiction of the law.

What is in this response not known before, and what relief does it hold out?

The Department of Justice knew that when it was recommended that the Government purchase the Cuban sugar. If the Government has the ability to regulate prices, as would be suggested by the creation of the Sugar Equalization Board, whose recommendation it is taking, then the Government had the right to use common sense to control the price of sugar in the interest of the consumer, instead of allowing the Government's machinery to be used to prevent the operation of the law of supply and demand. [Applause.] Why, gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House will agree; I know that there would be no question about their agreeing that when the Government interferes with natural laws the people invariably suffer, if there had not been injected here some personality. Gentlemen on the other side of the aisle resist, because it is thought that there is an effort to attack an individual, especially prominent in the public eye, which is not my purpose, for, personally, I think too well of the individual whom you are mentioning to make an attack. If I attack any particular conduct of his, that is a different thing, it is not personal, for that is a matter of the public service. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. STEENERSON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does that cut off any opportunity for amendment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have an amendment I would like to offer.

Mr. HASTINGS. Vote down the previous question then.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT. On that I ask for the years and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 124, answered "present" 3, not voting 131, as follows:

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. KENNEDY. If he were here, he would vote "aye" and I vote "no." I wish to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present.'

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY, is engaged in an important meeting of the Agricultural Committee. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear my name called.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on agricultural production.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on Senate joint resolution No. 156, the Polish resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HICKS, for to-morrow, on account of official business.

To Mr. MASON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

POINT OF NO QUORUM.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair thinks that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House; the gentleman from Texas is not going to adjourn the House every day. I think a quorum is present.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, the roll was called only a short time ago, and a quorum was present.

The SPEAKER. Some business has intervened in the meantime. The gentleman from Kansas moves a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

INCREASING FORCE AND SALARIES IN PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 457.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11984, being a bill to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes. That there shall be not to exceed two hours' general debate, one-half to be controlled by the chairman of the Committee on Patents and one-half by the ranking member of the minority of said committee. At the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule; whereupon the bill shall be reported to the House with the amendments, if any, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this rule brings before the House for consideration a bill unanimously reported from the Committee on Patents, and I may say that the resolution itself was unanimously reported from the Committee on Rules. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to discuss the resolution?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not want any time, though I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question. What is the program for to-morrow? Is the purpose to go on with this bill or to take up the Private Calendar?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The purpose is to take up this bill to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT. And to set aside the regular business?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We will take up the Private Calendar after this bill is disposed of. It is not probable that this bill will take all day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12046. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3076. An act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KRAUS, for to-morrow, on account of official business.

GRANTING CERTAIN LANDS TO SANDPOINT, IDAHO.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 9702) granting certain lands to the city of Sandpoint, Idaho, to protect the watershed of the water supply system of that city has been improperly referred to the Private Calendar. It should be properly on the Union Calendar, and the Chair directs such transfer to be made.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 5, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of Labor, submitting a proposed change in wording of the appropriation for "Miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Naturalization, 1921" (H. Doc. No. 669); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill for the relief of Capt. D. H. Tribou; to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11004) to grant certain lands to the village of Downey, State of Idaho, for the protection of its water supply, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 707), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 5, 1920.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, March 3, 1920.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Glass	Knox	Sheppard
Borah	Gronna	Lenroot	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hale	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Calder	Harris	McCormick	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Henderson	McLean	Smoot

Dillingham	Kendrick	Phipps	Wadsworth
Edge	Kenyon	Pittman	Watson
France	Keyes	Poindexter	Williams
Frelinghuysen	King	Ransdell
Gay	Kirby	Reed

Mr. KING. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is absent on account of the death of a member of his family.

The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are absent on official business.

I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] in attendance at the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

ANNIE E. CARSON.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 321) was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Annie E. Carson, widow of Robert Carson, late an employee on the maintenance roll of the Senate Office Building, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

MISS JULIA LATHROP'S TRIP TO EUROPE.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have a letter from an American mother who had two sons in the World War, calling attention to a clipping in the Washington Post of March 3, 1920. The clipping is as follows:

MISS LATHROP GOING ABROAD—WILL STUDY CONDITIONS OF CHILDREN IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

Miss Julia Lathrop, Chief of the Child Welfare Bureau, Department of Labor, on Saturday will sail from New York, aboard the Imperator, for Czechoslovakia, where she will study the conditions confronting the children of the new Republic.

While in Prague, Miss Lathrop will be the guest of President Masaryk and his daughter, Dr. Alice Masaryk, at the castle of Hradcany, the White House of Czechoslovakia.

The writer of the letter says, among other things:

I want to call your attention to the above clipping.

It seems strange to a taxpayer that this woman has to go so many thousand miles to study.

It is about time that such junkets were halted.

Mr. President, I simply call attention to this because I believe that all such junketing trips should cease. I think there is plenty to do here in America, studying the conditions of children and child labor, without going abroad. I have been trying to find out from what appropriation moneys are spent for this purpose, but so far I am uninformed.

Mr. OVERMAN. She is the head of the Children's Bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the head of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the bureau which was to cost but $25,000 per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that was the promise made when the bureau was created.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I send to the desk a reservation which I propose to offer to the resolution of ratification of the treaty with Germany. I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed reservation.

The reading clerk read as follows:

The credit of the United States shall not be pledged by or through any action of any representative of the United States or by any of the organs of government of the League of Nations without the prior affirmative authority of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon reservation No. 8, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. To that I offer no modification, and I ask that we may have a vote upon it.

Mr. KING. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reservation will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Massachusetts if he has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I have the floor only to ask for a vote; that is all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make a correction.

I notice in two of the Washington papers the statement is rather broadly made that I voted against the Shantung amendment on yesterday. I know that the statement was merely the result of inadvertence. I voted against an amendment the Senator from Massachusetts offered to his reservation, because I thought it did not add anything to the strength of his reservation, but I voted for the reservation.

I hope if the press report has carried the story to the country that I voted against the Shantung reservation the press will be kind enough to correct it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to reservation No. 8.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suppose nothing that can be said is liable to make any change in the vote on this reservation, but I still shall venture to call attention to the impossibility of such a reservation as is proposed.

The treaty constitutes the reparation commission, and the reparation committee is placed in control practically of the economic resources of Germany, and to a large extent it is placed in control of the amount of reparation which Germany must pay. The United States has, if it enters into this treaty, a member on that reparation commission. If so represented by a member of the commission, the United States will have a large voice in the orders of the commission. It will have a disinterested voice to a large extent, for the reason that the United States has little or no interest in the amount of reparation which Germany shall pay.

But when you stipulate in this reservation that it is a condition of our adherence to the treaty that the reparation commission shall make no order interfering with the exports from Germany to the United States or the exports from the United States to Germany you make it impossible for the reparation commission to function. If the United States, through its Congress, can control the reparation commission, any nation whose representative sits on the reparation commission can do the same thing. Our influence on the reparation commission must necessarily be through the action of our member on the commission, and that influence will be large, and, as I said, disinterested. To stipulate that we will not ratify the treaty except upon the condition that Congress shall control the reparation commission in its control of German commerce is to take an impossible position.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certanly.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the contention of those who support this reservation is that unless there is a reservation of this character the reparation commission might abrogate the tariff laws which might be enacted by Congress and permit the products of Germany to come into the United States under entirely different terms from those imposed upon the products of other countries; in other words, that they would have the power under the treaty to supersede the laws of Congress, and to repeal any enactment of Congress relative to our trade and commerce with Germany. What does the Senator say with respect to that broad contention, which I understand is made?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think such a contention has no foundation in fact. The powers of the reparation commission do not extend to the matter of tariffs at all. The chief control which the reparation commission is to exercise over German imports is its control over the gold of Germany. For a certain length of time the reparation commission has the power to say to what extent Germany shall be allowed to export her gold.

It might be said that if the reparation commission prohibits Germany from exporting any gold it might make it difficult for Germany to have any imports on the theory that only by gold could Germany pay for them. It is true also that if Germany should go into foreign countries, including the United States, and there borrow money and establish credits the reparation commission would at once have a mortgage upon the money or credit so secured. It is very probable, however, that the reparation commission, inspired with the idea of aiding Germany to get upon her feet and pay her debts, will relieve Germany from that mortgage upon money that she borrows in foreign countries.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield merely for a brief question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has just stated that the reparation commission would not have anything to do with the tariff. That may or may not be so; but is it not possible that the reparation commission might, in an indirect way, have something to do with the tariff? For instance, would the reparation commission have power to place an embargo on either imports or exports? If it would have that power, would it not really have something to do with the tariff? Of course, there could be no goods imported and no goods exported under those circumstances. It would be a case of absolute prohibition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The reparation commission, probably, in its control of the German economic resources, has some power to compel Germany to levy certain taxes; it has the power to see that Germany does not shirk its obligations to the nations represented on the reparation commission by failing to levy sufficient taxes to meet those obligations; it has the power to enforce against Germany the obligation which Germany has assumed in the treaty to tax its people to an extent equal at least to the taxes levied by the people of other countries that have been engaged in the war. To that extent it might compel Germany to raise a certain amount of money by taxation; but that levy of taxes would not apply to one country any more than to another. It would not necessarily apply to a tariff tax in Germany at all. It might be directed toward internal taxes, directing Germany to levy a larger income tax or a larger inheritance tax or simply a demand that Germany shall increase its revenues for the purpose of paying its debts. There is, however, a provision that there shall be equality between the nations, and that the United States shall have all the privileges in the ports of Germany, in the commerce of Germany, that any other nation represented on the commission shall have; and it is only by adhering to the treaty and becoming a member of the reparation commission that the United States secures such equality. We can not expect to have it if we remain outside of the treaty.

Mr. REED. The Senator says we can not expect to have equality if we remain outside of the treaty, and that the only way the United States can protect itself in its trade with Germany is through the reparation commission.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am inclined to think that we might negotiate a treaty with Germany, if we are put to that recourse, and the treaty might provide that we should have equal facilities with other countries in the ports and in the commerce of Germany and under the tariffs of Germany.

Mr. REED. But suppose we did not negotiate any treaty at all, does the Senator think the United States could not go right on and trade? In other words, does the Senator think we have already got to the point where the only way we can trade with a country is by and through an agency of the league?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I have said is this: We are as yet technically at war with Germany.

Mr. REED. But we are not going to be so very long.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are only temporarily under an armistice; we can not renew our peaceful relations with Germany, which were provided for in formerly existing treaties of trade and commerce and amity until Germany gets ready to admit us to that relationship. It is possible that Germany is so bound up in the treaty which she has already negotiated with other nations that she would not be free to make any such arrangement with us without their consent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if that is true—and, of course, the Senator from Nebraska must think it is true or he would not make the suggestion—then, already, the United States has been deprived of freedom of action in dealing with a great nation, in dealing with one of her great markets and one of her great sources of supply. I hope that is not true. I want to know if the Senator from Nebraska really contends, this treaty now being in force, although we have not signed it, that the United States can not go on and merely declare a condition of peace with Germany by any sort of means that is open to us, and then be perfectly free to deal with Germany if we stay outside of the league?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator misunderstands me. I have not said anything about the league. The reparation commission is not the organ of the league; it has nothing to do with the league. We are now discussing something which is entirely outside of the league.

Mr. REED. It is in the German treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But it is not in the league. The Senator mentions the league. When we went to war with Germany we not only destroyed all our intercourse with Germany and entered into a great controversy which ultimately involves the settlement of thousands of millions of dollars, but we destroyed all of the existing treaties that we had with Germany.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We can not restore those treaties for commerce by simply saying that we have quit fighting or by adopting a resolution that we are at peace with Germany. We can only do it by means of a treaty.

Mr. REED. By this reparation commission?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not said that. I say we can only do it by means of a treaty with Germany.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unless we enter this treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Unless we enter this treaty.

Mr. REED. The way is open, however, if we do not enter this treaty, for the United States to make any treaty it sees fit with Germany as a sovereign power.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the question the Senator raises is a very difficult question. We can, if we refuse to ratify this treaty, open negotiations with Germany to secure a treaty with her. Germany, however, is no longer a free agent to make a treaty with us; Germany has tied her hands and feet in the treaty which she has already made with the other nations of the world. Her powers of sovereignty are limited; her economic resources are tied up; and there may be things which Germany will not be able to do in a contract with us which she would like to do to put us upon an equality with the other nations.

Mr. REED. Then we have arrived at this situation, that Germany has entered into a treaty which not only deprives her of the power to make treaties of trade, commerce, and amity with the United States but deprives us of the opportunity to make such treaties; that is to say, this German treaty is so drawn as to deprive the United States of freedom of action. If so, it ought to be rejected by the Senate instanter—every line of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, what I have said is that Germany has already signed and ratified a treaty with her enemies in Europe, and with Japan also, which treaty has gone into effect, and that the powers of Germany to make a separate treaty with the United States are to a certain extent limited. We do not know—nobody knows—the extent to which Germany would be free, even if she desired, in a separate treaty with the United States to put us upon an equality with the other nations. The only way in which we are sure to be placed upon an equality with the other nations in our relations with Germany is to go into the treaty as they have gone into the treaty, which is still open for us to enter.

Mr. REED. And then——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, I take it that what the Senator means is that Germany, having entered into one treaty, can not be expected to enter into another which would violate the terms of the first.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And to that extent her liberty of action is limited.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; her liberty of action is limited.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Our liberty of action to negotiate is not limited at all; but we have to have her consent and she can not, of course, consent to a treaty with us which would violate the provisions of another treaty which she has already ratified.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me state the trouble with that contention. Germany has entered into a treaty with France and Italy and Japan and Great Britain by which she has given them a superior jurisdiction over her commerce and, perhaps, certain other things. If we ratify this treaty, we agree to those limitations; we are in no position to protest or in any way to protect ourselves, and we must secure the national right of this country to deal with another country through a reparation commission nominated and controlled by European and Asiatic countries; that is to say, we already, as a first step in this proceeding, place ourselves under the control of an agency of these powers, which, whether we call it an agency of the League of Nations or not, is, nevertheless, the agency of foreign powers, and we are asked when we ratify this treaty to agree to that limitation upon the rights of this country. For what purpose? For the purpose of having anything paid to us, of gaining any benefits to ourselves? Not at all; but for the purpose of enabling certain foreign Governments to collect their debts from Germany. It strikes me that it is a very serious piece of business for the United States to agree to a thing of that kind.

I wish now to call the Senator back to the question. The question that is presented by this reservation is this:

> The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany or from Germany to the United States only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

Now, what is the converse of that? The converse is that the United States understands that the reparation commission may regulate and may interfere with exports from the United States to Germany and imports from Germany to the United States. When a man opposes this reservation he takes the position that he wants the reparation commission to have the right to regulate commerce between Germany and the United States; he takes the position that he prefers to have the reparation commission regulate commerce between the United States and Germany rather than have the Congress of the United States determine that question. That is the question we are discussing, and we need not get outside of it at all, for that is all that is presented by the pending reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator has a misconception of this situation. The United States is not denied by the treaty any right or opportunity that is enjoyed by any other one of the nations that have been at war with Germany. On the other hand, if we ratify the treaty, we receive as a result of that treaty, through the administration of the reparation commission and otherwise, all of the benefits and all of the privileges which accrue to any other nation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator to let me proceed. I am willing to be interrupted, but I should like to finish the sentence.

Mr. REED. I do not want the Senator to get out of patience.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator interrupts not only me but everybody else and takes the floor, but I ask him now to wait until I finish or until I have proceeded a little further.

Mr. REED. I will be glad to wait until the Senator finishes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator proceeds upon the theory that by keeping out of this treaty the United States will be in a position to assert its rights against Germany; that it will be in a position where it can go to Germany, of course, and seek to negotiate a new treaty; but when we reach Germany what will we find? We will find Germany has already entered into a treaty with Great Britain and France and Italy and the other nations of the world and has accorded to them privileges and immunities and benefits which she can not accord to the United States; she has bound herself by this treaty to give them opportunities and control over her economic resources which she can not give to a nation not protected by the treaty. If, however, we ratify the treaty and become represented upon the reparation commission the United States is in a position there not only to enjoy every benefit that Great Britain enjoys with the trade of Germany, every benefit which France enjoys with the trade of Germany, every benefit which Italy enjoys with the trade of Germany, every benefit which the most favored nation in the world enjoys with the trade of Germany, but she secures a voice in the control over the economic resources of Germany. I say that the United States can ask no more than that. The United States is not justified in saying that she will only enter this treaty in case Congress is given the power to dictate to the reparation commission. No other nation claims that power. Great Britain does not claim it. France does not claim it. Italy does not claim it. The exercise of those powers over the economic resources of Germany is not only for the purpose of providing that Germany shall pay what she must pay in the way of reparations, but it is for the purpose of rehabilitating Germany, of seeing that Germany is placed in a position where she can most fully meet the great obligations which have fallen upon her as the result of this war.

It is idle to say that the United States can refuse to participate in this opportunity by rejecting the treaty, and nevertheless claim the right to go to Germany and require Germany to violate the treaty that she has entered into.

If the House of Commons were asserting the right to control the reparation commission we might assert that right; or if France or Italy or any other nation were asserting that right we might assert that right. But the reparation commission is a composite body on which are represented the great nations that fought the war, and if we ratify the treaty we become one of those great nations, and we get our proper share in the control of German affairs temporarily while the reparations are being worked out. We can not get it in any other way. In my opinion, we have no right, and it is perfectly absurd and impossible for us to assert that Congress should have the right, to dictate to this reparation commission.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has just stated that we will get our proportionate share. Does he mean with reference to commerce or with reference to the claims against Germany?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is very little difficulty in the matter of the claims that we make to reparations if we join the treaty; we will be paid in full, and we are the only nation that will be paid in full, for the damages we have suffered. I am speaking now of the individual damages. We make no claim for reparation such as the French and British Governments have made against Germany, as to the payment of pensions and otherwise; but we do secure in this treaty the right to use the funds which have come into our hands through the administrator of alien property in this country, and from that source alone we shall easily be able to compensate all of our nationals for any losses they have incurred.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator on that. He and I are in perfect accord with reference to that; but what I am mostly interested in is this: Will or will not this reparation commission have the control, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] so well illustrated, of the commerce between the United States and Germany? Will our exports, whether of manufactured articles or of cereals, depend upon the action of this reparation commission? That, really, is what I am chiefly interested in.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, Mr. President; it will not. The powers of the reparation commission over the commerce of Germany are indirect. They have a power over the gold of redemption which is in Germany, and of course they are not going to permit that gold to go out of Germany to an extent which will render her financial operations impossible. They are undoubtedly going to require Germany to keep enough of her gold to act as a cover for her currency, because to allow Germany to go bankrupt in that respect would place Germany in a position where she could not function in the payment of her reparations; and the control of the German gold supply will in a way affect the power of Germany to import goods.

Mr. GRONNA. That, of course, would be a direct limitation upon the commerce of Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That, of course, would apply to one country no more than to another. It would be a limitation on the power of Germany to export more than a certain quantity of gold; and my idea is that if overanxious and nervous Senators want to impose any condition on the reparation commission, it ought to be in the shape of a provision that we ratify this treaty with the understanding and upon the condition that the reparation commission shall at no time discriminate against the commerce of the United States, if it has any such powers to control the commerce at all.

Mr. GRONNA. Then the Senator admits that as the provision now stands the reparation commission could discriminate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. I think they could not; but I say that if it is desired to prevent that thing, which is discrimination, then a provision against discrimination would be sufficient; but to assert the right of the Congress of the United States to control an international body is a manifest absurdity as well as a wrong.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator, then, whether he would be opposed to a provision to the effect that no discrimination should be made between the so-called favored nations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I would not. I have not any idea that such a discrimination would be attempted.

Mr. GRONNA. So that in reality an amendment would be necessary in order to assure the American people that there would be no such discrimination by the reparation commission?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; on the other hand, I do not think it is necessary, but I say I would have no objection to it. A great many of these proposed amendments are not objectionable in themselves. They are unnecessary. For instance, the reservation to the effect that the United States will not assume any mandate without the consent of Congress is a manifest absurdity. That already exists. We could not assume a mandate over any country without the consent of Congress, but I have not any objection to putting it in. I am perfectly content to let it go in. I consented to its going in; and it is very much the same way with this.

I have not any idea that the reparation commission either has the power or would undertake to discriminate against the commerce of any nation represented on the reparation commission; and therefore I would have no objection at all, and I do not see how anyone could have any objection to a reservation providing that there should be no discrimination by the reparation commission against the commerce of the United States. I do not think it has the power or would have the intention or could have any possible purpose in discriminating, but there would be no objection to putting that in. That, however, is quite a different thing from putting in a statement that the Congress of the United States must be consulted by the reparation commission before it takes any action.

Much of the action of the reparation commission will have to be taken quickly. Much of its action will have to be changed. Many of its policies from time to time will have to be changed to suit the needs of the hour, and to say that every time a change occurs the reparation commission must consult the Congress of the United States is a manifestly impossible position in which to put the reparation commission.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator if it would not have been possible for the other powers, in entering into a treaty with Germany to which we were in no wise a party, to provide that the entire commerce of Germany should be under the control of a commission to be appointed in pursuance of such treaty? Would not those nations have had power to do that thing had they seen fit so to do?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, Mr. President, the powers of nations which have conquered another nation are almost absolute, and if the conquering nations desire to bind hand and foot the vanquished nation they can do so, and they can compel the payment of an indemnity over an enormous period of years. One of the dangers in the present case is that if this reparation commission is composed only of those nations in Europe which are bent upon collecting an indemnity from Germany, and which have a military fear of Germany, they may proceed to cripple Germany, even to an unwise extent, for many years to come; and it is in the interest of the German people that the United States should be represented upon that commission. It is in the interest of the German people that the disinterested influence of the United States upon that commission should be exerted, in order to soften the exactions which might otherwise be made against Germany through the enormous powers of this reparation commission. I have no doubt that ultimately, if not now, the people of Germany will be aroused to the fact that American participation in the reparation commission will be very beneficial to the German people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from Nebraska got out of patience because I rose to ask him a question. I addressed the Chair, and meant to address a question to the distinguished and somewhat irritable Senator from Nebraska. I wanted to ask the question then, because it was in point then; and I shall now have to recall some matters myself.

The Senator from Nebraska accuses me—to use the classical expression—of "butting in," and interrupting Senators. I think if the RECORD is examined, and the recollection of Senators is employed, they will know that for days the Senator from Nebraska has been in the habit, when any Senator was speaking, of rising and interjecting his remarks. It has all been accepted in perfect good part. Nobody has complained. I have permitted him to make a number of speeches in the middle of the speech I was making, and have done so without objection. I hope he will just keep good-natured, if he can, while we discuss this question.

There are one or two things to which I want to call attention, and I shall be very brief about it.

The Senator speaks of the benefits we are to receive through the reparation commission, the benefits we are to receive through this treaty, and at one time he employed the expression "our proper share"; that is, that we were to receive our proper share.

Let us get this question down to the fact. The fact is that under the treaty of peace with Germany, Germany yields all her foreign possessions. She yields Alsace and Lorraine forever. She yields, for a period of 15 years, a large part of her continental territory. She agrees to furnish enormous quantities of coal and iron, and agrees to pay an unascertained indemnity, to be fixed by her enemies.

Now, where does all that go? Does it come to the United States? Not one dollar of it; not one dollar of it. The solitary thing that the United States obtains by the treaty she already had, and that has been in part taken away from her by the treaty. She had possession of certain German boats which she had a right to keep, and which, if we had been represented as I think we ought to have been represented, we would have kept. But what did we do? We agreed to subtract from the tonnage of the vessels we had in our possession the total amount of American tonnage destroyed—which was all private tonnage, I believe; there may have been one little war craft that went down—and then the United States is to pay for the surplus of the tonnage she obtains into a fund that goes to France and Great Britain and Japan.

Those are the glorious benefits that we receive! Perhaps it was all right not to ask for any indemnity, but I am tired of hearing about the benefits the United States gets. That sort of talk ought not to be longer indulged in. The Senator used the expression, "We get back all we lost." That sort of statement ought not to be made. We are $25,000,000,000 poorer because of this war, directly, and how much we have lost in an economic sense no human being can estimate.

Now, this reparation commission is a thing that is functioning solely for the benefit of our associates in the war. It is functioning for the purpose of collecting indemnities not for our benefit but for the benefit of others, and the question is, What power shall be conferred upon it? The Senator states that the treaty of peace has already been signed and is already effective. It has already been signed by a part of those nations concerned in the war, but it has not been signed by the United States. Until the United States signs the treaty she has a right to insist upon any change which she thinks is proper. She has a right, of course, to reject it entirely, and the President is now threatening to withdraw it entirely, over Fiume, which, as said the other day, in comparison with the rest of the world, is a mere flyspeck in size and in importance. I do not, in saying that, say anything unkind of that city or its people. It is a little city of about 200,000 inhabitants, I think.

Mr. KING. Less than that.

Mr. REED. I have not looked up the figures. If the President of the United States can justly threaten to withdraw the treaty altogether because of a dispute over Fiume, how ridiculous it is to say that the treaty is already a fixed fact, that we can not change it, and that we must go into it with its reparation commission without a reservation or without an amendment, because it is already fastened upon the world. I wish that we could have a little consistency in the Senate for just a few hours by the great leader upon our side, to interrupt whom is a species not only of impudence but almost of sacrilege.

I want to bring the mind of the Senate for just a moment back to the question. We have not yet signed the treaty. When we do sign it—if we do—with the reparation commission in it, whatever the powers of that body are we have assented to them. Unless we now put the limitation upon those powers, we can not hereafter do it, save with the consent of other nations. We are now free to protect ourselves. When we have signed the treaty we are bound by its terms and our hands are tied.

The proposition is a very, very simple one. We do not undertake to say to the reparation commission that it can not function. Perhaps we ought to say so, but we do not. We do not undertake to say to the nations who were our associates in the war, "You shall not tie the hands of Germany or control the commerce of Germany." Perhaps we ought to say so, but I do not argue that. All that we say, in substance, is that the United States does not concede to the reparation commission the right to control commerce between Germany and the United States unless Congress shall hereafter grant that authority. If we do not say that, then we say the converse, which is that we do concede the right of the reparation commission to control the commerce between Germany and the United States without and in defiance of the action and will of Congress.

The Senator from Nebraska prefers, naturally prefers, to turn this right to control American commerce over to the international reparation commission, because he is an internationalist, because he believes in transferring the seat of control of the international affairs of the United States to the representatives of foreign governments sitting on foreign soil. He has become just that kind of an American.

Mr. GRONNA. Will it disturb the Senator if I interrupt him?

Mr. REED. Not a bit.

Mr. GRONNA. Can the Senator imagine a more drastic restriction upon the commerce of any country than to allow a commission to put an embargo on her gold, which I understand is the power this commission would have?

Mr. REED. I can not imagine one that some of our associates in the war would know how better to employ for their benefit. Let us see. Suppose we refused our assent altogether to the reparation commission and said that we ratified the treaty but we did not ratify it as to any of its provisions creating the reparation commission. Suppose thereafter that our associates in the war would say to Germany, "You can not ship dyestuffs to the United States," what would the United States be doing? Is it a powerless nation? Must it run under the petticoats of the League of Nations for its protection? Must it come whining like a coward and prostrate itself at the feet of some international tribunal to get its rights? I imagine what we would say in a case of that kind, assuming now that we have a National President with the national pride and national spirit that our Presidents have always had. In diplomatic language we would say, "We can not permit this. You are interfering with the trade and commerce of the United States. We must insist that all restrictions be removed." If there should be a refusal we would find a means to protect ourselves. It might not be war. It might be, if they embargoed our grains to Germany, we might embargo our grains to Great Britain. If they embargoed our steel to Germany, it might be that we would have to embargo their shipments here. But there is no danger of that. The European nations would not put the United States in a position where she must resort to those extreme measures.

But if they are made of that kind of stuff, which would permit them to think of such a thing seriously, then I do not want them as our partners. If it be true that Great Britain, France, and Italy, because we have not agreed to their reparation commission having a power greater than that exercised by Congress over our own trade, will do acts of injustice to the United States through the reparation commission, then I want them not as our partners but outside our household.

It will hardly be denied that we have rendered them some service in this war. It is not denied by any sensible man that if it had not been for the troops of the United States Germany would have captured the capital of France. It is not denied that at the present time we are taxing our own people to raise the money to pay the interest upon the bonds, the proceeds of which were loaned to Great Britain, France, Italy, and other countries; and that it may be many years before they will be able to meet their obligations. There is in the Senate and in this country a disposition to extend to them every generosity that it is possible for us to do, with justice to our own people. For the Senator from Nebraska to stand here in one moment and say they are most desirable partners with whom we should link our fortunes for all time, and in the next breath to say that if we do not sign this treaty just as it is written they will immediately become our enemies and conspire against us, seeking to destroy our trade and our commerce, is for the Senator from Nebraska to take two positions that are absolutely and diametrically opposite each to the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The question is on agreeing to reservation No. 8, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall occupy only a little time of the Senate, but I desire to express my understanding of the pending reservation and some of the incidents which have been connected with its preparation and presentation.

The reparation commission is not provided for in the league covenant. It is a part of the treaty. A majority vote of that commission, as I understand it, decides all questions brought before it.

Mr. THOMAS. I think not all questions. There is one article of the treaty which requires unanimity in regard to certain matters concerning the debts and securities.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is correct about that. There is an exception, but so far as the——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not hear the Senator from Colorado. Will the Senator state again what he said?

Mr. THOMAS. There is an article of the treaty—I will find it for the Senator—which imposes unanimity of action upon the reparation commission in regard to certain subjects, that principally affecting the postponement of the time of the maturity of the obligations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But the subject now under discussion—commerce—is the one to which I am directing my remarks, and it is controlled by the statement I made, namely, that a majority vote of the reparation commission decides. It has been truthfully stated I think by both the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and conceded by all, that the United States has less interest in the reparations which will be made as a result of the war than any other nation; and yet reparations may be made under orders, as has been conceded here, which will vitally affect the commerce of this Republic. The Senator from Nebraska thinks the reparation commission can not affect our commerce with Germany, and that is the sole matter now before the Senate. Enough has been said already to disclose much doubt in the matter. Why not dispel that doubt? I believe that the commission will have power to affect seriously the commerce between the United States and Germany. Does any Senator want that done? Is it not wise to guard against such a possibility now?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. KING. My recollection of the powers and functions of the reparations commission leads me to the conclusion that its activities might restrict exports and direct the lines of exports; but I do not think they would have the power to interfere with imports unless it was with respect to payment. I have no doubt that they will treat Germany as if she were in the hands of a receiver, and they are the receivers, so to speak, appointed by the court, the court being the allied and associated nations. They take charge of the bankrupt and the estate of the bankrupt and control very largely, of course, for a number of years the disposition of the assets of the bankrupt. In the disposition of those assets they would allocate the gold which Germany has, determine where the payments shall go, determine where certain assets of Germany shall be distributed, and make allocation of her dyestuffs and other products, and in a way, of course, could interfere with the exports of Germany. But the way I read the treaty I doubt whether they would have the power to interfere with the exports from the United States to Germany, provided we can find any Germans who have money or credit or goods with which to pay for the goods which we ship to them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. All of which goes to prove my statement that there is doubt in the minds of Senators as to how far this reparation commission may go in affecting our commerce.

I am not now discussing the question as to whether we ought to go into the treaty and have a reparation commission or not. I am favorable to it myself, and I have proceeded on the assumption that we are going to become a party to the treaty, and that we will therefore probably have a representative on the reparation commission. This reservation assumes that as a fact, otherwise it would be idle to discuss the matter at all. But inasmuch, I repeat, as that commission in commerce conditions acts by a majority, and inasmuch as what we are doing is not so much for ourselves as for the benefit of others, it occurs to me that it is the part of justice and wisdom for us to safeguard our generosity, for an occasion might arise when it would be exceedingly desirable for the United States Congress to protect itself against injury. I am going further to assume that the United States Congress would act by a majority. Such a majority can safely be relied upon to do its duty, the right thing under all circumstances, as the particular occasion requires. Do Senators prefer to trust an interested foreign commission to their own Congress?

Furthermore, Mr. President, I understood—and Senators are present who can correct me if I am mistaken—that an honest, sincere effort was made on the part of the friends of ratification of the treaty and the covenant under proper reservations to compose their differences. I heard, however, many things said yesterday about it that have discouraged me somewhat in this belief, especially when it was declared positively that most of this was done simply for the purpose of talking the matter over and nobody was to be bound by it, and probably nobody was to recommend any suggestion or agreement that would look to harmony. We could as well believe now that the whole thing was largely a bluff.

I make the further statement, which I hope will be corrected if it is wrong, that the members of this bipartisan conference representing both sides of the Senate agreed upon section 8, which is the matter before us.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I call his attention to the joint report on the subject by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], in which it is stated that—

Reservations 3, 8, 12, and 13 were tentatively accepted by all without change.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That has been my understanding, and I am curious to know if the arguments which the Senator from Nebraska has made to-day against this provision were made by him to that joint committee of the two sides of the Senate when they met at the conference.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Georgia is mistaken. What he has just read is not a statement by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and myself, an agreement by us, but a statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator then this question? Was the Senator from Nebraska present at the conference and did he tentatively agree to it without change?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I did not. This is one of the original reservations that was not changed and was not agreed upon any more than the fourteenth reservation or the reservation relating to article 10.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Was it discussed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. I have always objected to it and always denounced it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Did the Senator object to it then with the argument that he has now presented?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did, very emphatically.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have been informed to the contrary, and that there was practically a unanimous tentative agreement as to this particular provision of the reservation. Of course, I understood from what the Senator said yesterday that he did not feel himself bound and would not be bound unless everything that was agreed to met his approval; but I am wondering if the Senator would have felt bound if the reservation to article 10 had been modified as he suggested.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator takes up a matter of which I am perfectly free to speak. It often happens that when two parties sit down to a table to compose differences over a document there will be giving and taking and finally a compromise. In this case we considered one thing and we considered another, and discussed them for our own benefit, and it is quite likely that compromises would have been reached if they could have covered everything, but all compromise was destroyed when upon the vital points we were told that no yielding would be had at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, that to me is a very discouraging thing in the consideration of the treaty. It appears that we have two classes of irreconcilables, so called, one composed mostly of Republicans, 12 to 14 of them, who openly admit that they want no treaty, no league covenant, the other, 15 to 20 Democrats, who insist that they must have what they want or no treaty. Those two classes of Senators added together will constitute probably more than one-third of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Michigan place me in either one of those classes?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, let me vindicate the position that I hold. The Senator must be aware that when we reached the reservation on article 10 we proposed several different compromises, and we finally got to a point where almost every one around the table had agreed on the so-called composite bipartisan compromise on article 10. At the last minute the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was called from the room, and took with him the Republican members of the conference. After waiting 15 or 20 minutes I went to the door of the adjoining room, where those Senators were in conference, and said that in view of their being detained so long it might be wise for us to adjourn until the next day, when we would be able to settle the matter. That was agreed to. We came back the next day at the appointed hour, expecting to proceed with the conference. We then found that the Senator from Massachusetts was not present; he was detained in another conference, it was stated; and it turned out to be a conference with the irreconcilable Republican Senators. We again adjourned on that account. When we again reconvened the Senator from Massachusetts told us he could yield nothing at all upon the reservation to article 10.

We then formally proposed to the Senator from Massachusetts that we would accept the draft which was upon the table, which we had been considering. He stated that that was impossible. We then asked if he would propose some change in article 10, but he replied that he had nothing whatever to propose. We then formally tendered as another proposition the reservation on article 10 which had been drawn by former President Taft and said we would accept that if he were willing to do so, but the Senator from Massachusetts said he could not do it. I then announced if Senators on the other side would consent to no compromise at all on this vital article the only thing to do was to take the controversy to the floor of the Senate. It has been brought here as the result of that failure. Now, how can the Senator from Michigan say that I am an irreconcilable, when I have tendered two propositions on this vitally important article, one drawn by ex-President Taft and one framed by the bipartisan conference?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me ask the Senator from Nebraska another question: Suppose the conference had adopted one of those reservations, would the Senator then have voted to ratify the treaty with the other Senate reservations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there would have been no difficulty in reaching a conclusion on everything else.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have been watching as carefully and in as unbiased a manner as possible——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. In just a moment—the discussion that has been going on in the Senate on this subject. I have not participated largely in it, although I have been deeply interested. I have been trying to discover if I could the motives which actuated Senators who are opposing the ratification of the treaty unless it can be ratified exactly as they suggest; and I have drawn my conclusions from observation and from what the Senator from Nebraska himself has said on the floor that there is very little disposition on his part or theirs to compromise in favor of what is the repeatedly recorded majority sentiment of the Senate. We have been voting on the reservations. Possibly the vote on the first reservation which occurred while I was necessarily absent does not bear out the following, but every other reservation has carried by a safe majority, and would have done so if every one of the irreconcilables on this side of the Chamber had not voted; and yet if we shall go through and adopt the reservations by a substantial majority of the Senate, then I am prepared to state what I believe, namely, that the Senator from Nebraska will still oppose the final ratification of the treaty after it has been perfected by that kind of a vote in the Senate. Am I correct about that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is correct in saying that I will not accept the Lodge reservations; but I will accept a compromise. I tendered a compromise; I have been anxious to go nine-tenths of the way in the direction of a compromise. That is not the attitude of an irreconcilable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In the last two or three days reservations have been presented which the Senator from Nebraska and some of his colleagues who were opposed to them stated were the same in meaning as those proposed by these objectors, and yet without reason, certainly without the slightest spirit of compromise, they voted against such reservations.

I am not a stickler for phraseology. I voted on yesterday for a proposition which the bipartisan conference adopted, and which was framed and offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and it was agreed to. It differed in language from the one which had been previously presented, known as the Lodge reservation, but I thought it meant the same thing as the original, and, for the sake of compromise, I was willing to vote for it. Not so, however, the Senator from Nebraska, who opposed it, even though it was admitted that it meant practically the same thing. Now I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it is a very profitless business to go over the misunderstandings between the different members of the bipartisan conference. We broke up on the proposition that we would not submit to any change of principle in article 10. We did not say that we would not modify it. On the contrary there was a draft made—not by me, but by other members of the conference—to this effect:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve by the use of its military or naval forces or by the economic boycott or by any other means the territorial integrity—

And so forth.

Taking the wording of the reservation presented by the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator from Nebraska stated in a newspaper—I do not know how correctly he was reported, of course—that that was worse than the original, but it was a change which I think our members of the conference were entirely ready for. We did not refuse any change at all; we simply said we could not submit to a change of principle; and the Senator from Nebraska offered nothing which was not a very great change of principle in the amendment. I do not regard such a suggestion as a compromise.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the proceedings of the bipartisan commission are more and more confusing to me. As I said, to begin with, I had hoped for beneficial results. Then I felt that if article 10 was the rock upon which the Senate was to split, that question ought to be first settled. Otherwise, we are simply wasting time. If 20 or 25 Senators on the other side and 13 Senators on this side are determined that the treaty shall not be ratified, those on this side maintaining that they will vote against it whether the reservation is adopted or not, and those on the other side maintaining that they will vote against it unless all reservations are either rejected or changed to suit them in every particular, what is the sense of taking the time of the Senate in thrashing over old straw, day after day, when we know that at the end of it all the treaty will fail? So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am ready to have the question settled now by a vote on article 10 and be done with it.

I am willing to yield on matters of phraseology, but I am not willing to yield, and I do not think the majority of the Senate are willing to yield, on the principles involved in the reservation to article 10. I agree that that is the vital part of this whole business. If that could be determined upon and we could settle whether we could pass it or not, and if the conclusion is to pass it, I would be perfectly willing as I am now, in fact, to arrange in a satisfactory manner some of the other reservations which Senators are now opposing so bitterly, and to me so unreasonably.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there is much in what the Senator says. It was not my proposition to pass over article 10 and take up the other reservations first. It was the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts; it was his motion to that effect. It was generally supported on the Republican side of the Chamber, and there was no opposition to it on our side of the Chamber. We simply assented to it. We are perfectly willing on our side of the Chamber to go now to the vital question involved in article 10 in order to see if an adjustment can be reached.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Massachusetts can speak for himself, but I had understood that the postponement was made practically by unanimous consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it was made as the result of a motion. A few of us voted against it. I should have preferred to go directly to article 10, but I did not care to make a controversy over it.

Mr. LODGE. There was no roll call.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was merely a viva voce vote. However, I think the Senator from Michigan is correct. I believe it would save time if we dropped these minor matters which are of less importance and come to a consideration of the vital principle contained in article 10, where we differ radically on principle. There may be a chance to compromise the differences. We have tendered two opportunities to compromise. Certainly former President Taft, who is a Republican, with a great Republican following in the United States to-day, can not be charged with having put forward a proposition which is Democratic. He has put forward a compromise proposition which we are ready to accept.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have never considered this question from a partisan standpoint, and I have regretted exceedingly that partisanship has been injected into it time and time again. Because Mr. Taft suggests a proposition does not necessitate my indorsement, although I have a great respect for his ability as a lawyer and as a statesman; but this is a question of such vital importance that I must decide my own action. Neither Mr. Taft nor Mr. Wilson ought to control the action of Senators against their reason and judgment. Quite as wise and patriotic men support the Senate reservations. Senators should act under their solemn oaths and not on the threats or dictum of Presidents or ex-Presidents. Their advice should be, and has been, considered; but the Senate must decide.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator considers that I was trying to drag politics into this matter, he is entirely mistaken. I merely cited the fact that there are 40 Democratic Senators who have offered to accept either the bipartisan compromise or the compromise presented by the former Republican President of the United States. Certainly that is not a Democratic compromise; that is not a Democratic proposition. We are offering to accept what one of your great leaders in this country, a prominent man in many affairs, particularly in connection with the question of the League of Nations, has presented to the country; and can it be said that we are not ready to compromise when we make you that offer?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Nebraska continues to refer to the bipartisan compromise. There was no bipartisan compromise on article 10. The conference was broken off entirely on that question. There was discussion about it; but what the Senator calls a bipartisan compromise was something that was offered there to which I never agreed and to which the others never agreed. I do not regard it as a compromise, because it sacrifices principles in the reservation to article 10 which I am not willing to sacrifice.

As to President Taft's proposition, it opens an entirely new field of obligation, and, Mr. President, with all respect to ex-President Taft, I do not take my opinions from him any more than I do from the existing President. It does not seem to me that the ex-President has any more right to attempt to control the Senate than the President has. It is for the Senators to determine for themselves.

I will say just a word in conclusion. I did ask, as of course everyone knows, to have article 10 passed over, because I wanted to complete the changes that had been proposed in the bipartisan conference, and also I wanted to bring forward two very important changes which I think constitute great improvements in the reservations. I wanted to get all the reservations completed, so that the country could see just what had been offered by us, and then decide upon article 10.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in conclusion I wish again to refer to the matter directly before the Senate, which is the question of the adoption of reservation No. 8. I am assuming, as does the reservation, that the United States is going to become a party to the treaty, and when it does become a party the situation will be peculiar. The United States is granting much and asking for and getting nothing. Therefore, I believe it is the part of wisdom and of patriotism for the Senate to insist that, if selfishness or greed or anything else may actuate the foreign majority of the reparation commission in determining upon regulations or rules which may result detrimentally to the United States, the Congress of the United States should pass upon that subject. It seems to me, if there had been no excitement over this matter, if the lines had not been so sharply drawn and passion had not run quite so high, there would be no possible objection to this reservation, and that the Senate, with practical unanimity, would have adopted it. Therefore, believing as I do that the reservation may be vitally essential to the interests of the United States and that under no circumstances can it be injurious to the proper and legitimate interests of any other nation, I shall support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to reservation No. 8.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska presented strong reasons why we should ratify the treaty when he pointed to the fact that Germany could not now enter into a treaty in disregard of the treaty which she has made with the other nations that have been at war with her, and that it was extremely important that we should ratify the treaty in order that we might participate in the administration of the terms of the treaty applicable to ourselves. I believe thoroughly in that view, and it is for that among other reasons that I have been seeking reservations with which two-thirds of the Senate would ratify the treaty.

But the Senator from Nebraska has, by the course he has pursued, thrown obstacles in the way of ratifying the treaty, and done so time and again. I think he is doing it in his criticism of the pending reservation. We ought to have adopted this reservation without discussion and without hesitation.

Now, let us see what has happened with reference to it: It was before a bipartisan conference, and it was passed, at least tentatively, as not objectionable. A printed pamphlet has been published giving the history of that conference, and in that we find the statement of the senior Senator from Massachusetts that—reservations 3, 8, 12, and 13 were tentatively accepted by all without change.

At the close of this pamphlet is an interview with the Senator from Nebraska, in which he called attention to the different views entertained as to the Monroe doctrine and article 10, but he did not suggest differences as to other reservations beyond those where modifications were agreed upon in the conference. I think we had a right to conclude that reservation No. 8 was passed as not objectionable. I do not mean that all of the Senators thought this reservation necessary, but a Senator could accept a reservation that he did not think was necessary if other Senators believed it necessary.

Now, let us come to this reservation. If we turn to the treaty we will find that it provides that the reparation commission shall be unanimous in its action upon only a certain number of subjects, and those questions which may involve exports from our country to Germany or imports from Germany to our country do not fall within the number of those that require a unanimous vote, so they are left to be disposed of by a majority vote. The treaty states that the majority vote in other matters may control; so that as to the powers given by the treaty that this reservation seeks to guard against a majority can control.

Those countries are all purchasers of raw material, and the United States is the great seller of raw material. We ship our copper and our iron and our coal and our wheat and our tobacco and our cotton to these countries. They buy them. They are interested in getting them as cheaply as possible, and Germany is a buyer of all. Now, I do not believe that under a fair construction of their powers the reparation commission would have the right seriously to interfere with our exports or imports; but the language is doubtful, and the powers are quite broad. If I am right that they would not have the power, then this reservation does not encroach upon their power. If they should take the view that they do have the power, then this reservation will guard the United States and her interests.

This is one reservation that I thought would please the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], because it is an interpretive reservation. It declares that the United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States, by act or joint resolution of Congress, approves such regulation or interference. Action by Congress would not be required for each act of the commission. A general act could fix the extent of interference to which we would consent. It simply says that we understand that by entering into this treaty we have not transferred to the reparation commission power to interfere with our commerce where Congress ordinarily would regulate our action. That is all it does. It is a declaration of our view of the meaning, and if we ratify this treaty it will reach on through the operation of the reparation commission as a direction to our representative upon it and as a declaration of our construction which will go far toward guarding against interferences which might seriously disturb our exports or our imports.

The Senator from Nebraska said that he voted against many of these reservations because they were unnecessary. If they were unnecessary, and did nothing, they certainly did not nullify the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator passes from the discussion of the particular reservation now under consideration, I should like to ask him if he will have the kindness to give us a concrete case of injury to the United States which would be averted or guarded against by this reservation? What is the danger at which this reservation is aimed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there is no harm in it, what objection is there to it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that is another question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But it is quite an important question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Perhaps it is, but it is not my question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But it is my answer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. Then I take it that the answer of the Senator is that he does not know; he can not think of any such concrete case as that of which I speak, but all that he can say for it is that it can do no harm.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator somewhat further, then. The power that this commission has is very extensive. It can be used with a view of checking imports. It can be used for that purpose; it might be used for that purpose; and this reservation declares our construction of the commission's power to the effect that it is not to be used for that purpose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have a great deal of sympathy with this reservation; but as I recall that I voted against it before and I am inclined to vote against it now, because I do not see that the reservation—and I shall be glad to hear the Senator further in regard to it—will in any way whatever affect the powers of our Government in dealing with Germany. Moreover, there is some question as to whether it would be proper, in view of the terms of the treaty, to obtain the change which the reservation would imply was desired.

Conceding that the reparation commission have the great powers attributed to them, powers which may be abused, powers which, if arbitrarily exercised, might subject Germany to humiliation and economic servitude, still it would seem that there must be a commission charged with the duty of carrying into effect certain provisions of the treaty, of making distribution of the assets of Germany, of allocating the cattle and horses and other things to the various nations entitled thereto because of the wanton destruction by Germany of similar property in Belgium and France and other places. There must be a commission charged with the duty of seeing that certain terms of the treaty of an economic character are carried into effect. Now, this reparation commission has been charged with this responsibility. Suppose we should now declare that we construe the treaty as giving no authority to the reparation commission to interfere with our tariff laws; what good would it do? Any promulgation of the commission would not interfere with our tariff laws. It is possible that the commission might interdict the importation into Germany of certain foods and products from the United States; but does this reservation affect their power to do that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a declaration upon our part that we do not concede that they have the power, and that we construe the treaty as not giving them the power.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator if he does not think that in the proper administration of their duties, taking into account the purpose for which the reparation commission was created, they must have some power to determine to whom exports shall go, and of course that would affect the question of imports, and therefore determine, in part at least, from whom imports shall come. Have they not the power, and ought they not to have the power, in order to carry out the work which would devolve upon them, to determine how and when payments shall be made?

There must be obtained from Germany so much in gold, so much to meet the various monetary obligations which were imposed upon her. She will be squeezed to meet her war indemnities. Now, this commission is charged with the duty of enforcing certain terms of the treaty. If Germany may trade indiscriminately, may export indiscriminately, may pay in gold, if she pleases, for the cotton from the South, or the cattle from the plains of the West, or the copper from the mines of the West, she may by those transactions interfere materially with the discharge of her obligations in cash to Belgium, to England, to France, and to other nations.

It seems to me that the duties resting upon the reparation commission, in view of the theory upon which the treaty is drawn, must grant them some power to interfere with German exports, and to some extent with imports, and that this reservation would be a mere idle fulmination or an idle declaration upon our part.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not agree with the view of the Senator. Broad powers are given to this commission, but I do not agree that they have a right to put a stop to our exports to Germany in any particular line, nor do I believe that they have a right to prevent exports from Germany to the United States; but the Senator's line of argument indicates that a different view might be taken, and this reservation is a declaration of interpretation to guard the interests of the United States.

Mr. President, I think it was wise to postpone action upon article 10 until we have disposed of the other reservations. I think the best time to take up article 10 is when we have gotten rid of the other reservations, and have them substantially before the country, and they are understood; after we have shown unquestionably that they do not nullify the treaty; that they guard

American interests only, that they wisely, either by interpretation or by reservation, preserve to this country certain rights that we all hold dear. Take, for instance, the matter of mandates referred to by the Senator from Nebraska. He declares that no reservation on that subject was necessary; that it did not change the covenant. He differs from the view of the President, for the President in his conference with the Foreign Relations Committee practically conceded that our representative in Switzerland, acting under the direction of the Government here—that is to say, the President himself—could make the preliminary agreement to put a mandatory upon the United States.

The subsequent execution of that mandatory would be with Congress; but if our representative in Switzerland accepted it, under the direction of the President, and the President approved it, what an embarrassing thing it would be for the United States thereafter!

Of course, if there was the freest conference in advance between the Senate and the administration, and the administration acted only after satisfactory assurance was given by the Senate, which in foreign relations is made the constitutional adviser of the President, there might not be any serious trouble; but not only in this administration but in prior administrations there has been an assumption of authority entirely independent of the Senate, without the advice of the Senate, to negotiate and to act in foreign matters. I regard the reservation as to mandatories as most important and valuable. It does not, however, nullify the treaty.

Again, take the reservation with reference to our domestic affairs. The league covenant gave to the council the right to determine whether a particular dispute was solely domestic under rules of international law or whether it was mixed international and domestic. The council was to decide what questions are solely domestic and whether it would proceed to investigate them. Our reservation provides that the United States will alone decide whether a question is domestic; and if we decide that it is domestic, we give no authority whatever to the council to investigate it. The reservation does not nullify the treaty. It simply takes out from under it our domestic questions.

Is there any American citizen who wishes some foreign power to determine whether our problems are solely domestic, or mixed domestic and international, and take charge of them?

There has not been a reservation adopted here that nullifies the treaty, but they are reservations that clarify it and take us out from under certain provisions that no American citizen, or very few American citizens, would wish placed upon us.

I again say with reference to this reservation that I believe it a fair construction of the terms of the treaty, and the reparation commission could not interfere with our commerce, our exports to or our imports from Germany under the terms of the treaty as I construe it; but I rest with more confidence in their noninterference when we declare this interpretation as a part of the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The Clerk will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Glass	Knox	Shields
Brandegee	Gore	Lenroot	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Gronna	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Capper	Hale	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Colt	Henderson	New	Spencer
Culberson	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Townsend
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Trammell
Edge	Kellogg	Phipps	Wadsworth
Elkins	Kendrick	Pittman	Warren
Fletcher	Kenyon	Poindexter
Gay	Keyes	Ransdell
Gerry	King	Sheppard

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope we may now vote on reservation No. 8.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer the following substitute for the reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed substitute will be stated.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

The United States understands that the reparation commission will in its control over German economic resources in no respect so exert its powers as to discriminate against the commerce of the United States with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. Not being able to get a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent on account of illness in his family. I promised to take care of him by a pair during his absence. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do so and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. On this matter he is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a standing pair, is absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GAY. I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and vote "yea." I ask that the announcement as to my pair and its transfer may stand for the day.

Mr. HENDERSON. May I inquire whether the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). In the absence of my pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GAY. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] are absent in attendance at the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is absent on public business.

I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], if present, would vote "yea" on this proposition.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 37, as follows:

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's substitute for reservation No. 8 was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon agreeing to reservation No. 8. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I am informed that my general pair, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], if present would vote in the affirmative, so I feel that I am at liberty to vote on this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my general pair as before, I am obliged to withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair that I made a moment ago, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer that I made a while ago, I vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement regarding my pair and its transfer that I made a few moments ago, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of my pair, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], I am unable to vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY], and I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made upon the previous vote concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GAY. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON. In the absence of my pair, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. If present, he would vote "yea." He is paired on this question with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] are absent in attendance at the funeral of the late Senator BANKHEAD.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is absent on public business.

I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], if present, would vote "nay" on this proposition.

So reservation No. 8 as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was agreed to, as follows:

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

TRANSFER OF MOTOR-PROPELLED VEHICLES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I submit the report of the committee of conference on Senate bill 3037, for the transfer of surplus motor-propelled vehicles, which I ask may be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of section 5 of the House amendment add the following: "Provided, That any State highway department to which is assigned motor-propelled vehicles and other equipment and supplies, transferred herein to the Department of Agriculture, may, in its discretion, arrange for the use of such vehicles and equipment, for the purpose of constructing or maintaining public highways, with any State agency or municipal corporation at a fair rental which shall not be less than the cost of maintenance and repair of said vehicles and equipment"; and the House agree to the same.

JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JULIUS KAHN,
JOHN C. MCKENZIE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration, as in legislative session, of the conference report which has just been read? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to ask the Senator from New York whether the report includes any provision for the transfer of airplanes to the Post Office Department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President, this bill covers only motor vehicles and road-making machinery.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not distinctly hear all of the reading of the report, but I understand from some remarks made to me that it does. We have a provision in the Post Office appropriation bill on the subject, and I do not want any conflict to occur in the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For the transfer of airplanes?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had so understood. The vehicles mentioned in the bill are referred to as motor-propelled vehicles and airplanes, also construed to be motor-propelled vehicles. I merely wanted to know if this legislation covered that class of machines, because, as I have said, we have provided for them in the Post Office appropriation bill, and I did not want any conflict to occur. I did not believe the language did include them, but my attention was called to it, and I therefore desired to ask the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The term "motor-propelled vehicles" is used in this bill, it is true, but neither the House committee nor the Senate committee ever had any idea that that was meant to include airplanes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to ask the Senator from New York if this is the bill transferring to the States for road-making purposes certain surplus material of the War Department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether or not there is a transfer of motors in addition to those—about 15,000 in number—which were turned over to the department some six or eight months or possibly a year ago?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Turned over to which department?

Mr. KING. To the Public Roads Division of the Agricultural Department. As I recall, by a former bill there were turned over to the Agricultural Department for road-making purposes in the neighborhood of 25,000 vehicles. Fifteen thousand were actually delivered, as I understand, but it was claimed by the Agricultural Department that they would get in the neighborhood of 25,000. What I am inquiring about is, Does this bill transfer more than the original number which was authorized?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This bill directs the Secretary of War to transfer to the Agricultural Department for road-making purposes, for use upon the highways in the building of roads, all motor-propelled vehicles and road-making machinery, a list of which is included in the bill itself, which are declared surplus and not needed by the War Department.

The situation is somewhat as follows: Under the terms of a previously passed bill a great proportion of the surplus motor trucks have been distributed. There was no authority under previous legislation for the distribution of other kinds of road-making machinery. If this bill should pass, through the adoption of the conference report, there will be a few more motor trucks, but not many, to be distributed, and a considerable quantity of road-making machinery for which the War Department has no use under the sun and which has been declared to be surplus.

I may say to the Senator from Utah that a total of something like 37,000 motor vehicles have been disposed of, in one way or another, by the War Department since the armistice. Some have been sold outright; some have been transferred to the Post Office Department; some have been transferred to the Department of Agriculture; and there may be some other places to which they have been transferred. This cleans it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF SOLDIER DEAD FROM FRANCE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, on December 10 last I introduced a joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the situation regarding graves of the soldiers who lost their lives in France. That joint resolution was submitted to the War Department, with the request that they inform the Senate Military Affairs Committee as to their opinion of the advisability of creating such a commission. A reply was sent to the committee by the Secretary of War, and I am going to ask unanimous consent that it be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he is making a report on the joint resolution?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, why not leave the reading of the letter until the report is made from the committee and have it read at that time?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Because I believe that the resolution at the present time is not appropriate, and that another resolution should be offered asking for further information, which I intend to submit at once.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that it is merely encumbering the RECORD to read the letter now, particularly if another resolution is to be offered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will read the letter myself.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right. The Senator can do that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection that I believe that this is a question in which all of the parents of those who lost their lives on the other side are deeply interested; and if the experience of other Members of the Senate is the same as mine, I know they are continually being appealed to in order to ascertain definitely what the policy of the War Department is in regard to the disposal of these bodies.

This letter reads as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 14, 1920.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to S. J. Res. 133, creating a commission to report on the practicability of bringing to the United States the remains of American soldiers buried in France, and to mark and care for the graves of those whose remains it is not practicable to remove, and to express the hope that the same be not favorably considered inasmuch as the creation of such a commission as therein proposed is duplicating definite activities already undertaken by the War Department and now in process of actual operation.

The Adjutant General's Office has for a considerable length of time been collating expressions from relatives of the dead concerning the final disposition of their remains.

The Quartermaster Corps, through its graves registration service, has been busily engaged in locating and marking graves of American dead overseas and definite steps have already been taken to obtain the advice of the National Fine Arts Commission to determine upon an acceptable design for permanent headstones which are to be utilized in the marking of such graves as may remain in France after the removal project shall have been completed.

Section 4 of the proposed joint resolution runs counter to the French law of December 29, 1915, and its supplemental regulations, in which the method of procuring cemetery space for allied armies is prescribed. The necessary machinery for acquiring lands for commercial purposes has already been set up under the direction of the Quartermaster General, and that organization is in close liaison with the French ministry of war in relation to all cemeterial affairs.

The employment of caretakers and all arrangements for cemeterial maintenance are now in the hands of the graves registration service under adequate regulations to provide proper marking and care of cemeteries remaining in France. It is therefore believed that the best interests of the United States will be subserved if the question of the care of American dead in France be left in the hands of the War Department, as already contemplated.

Very truly, yours,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. President, I now submit the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 322) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what steps have been taken to effect a settled policy in regard to disposal and protection of the remains of American soldiers who have died in France, and what amount or amounts of money have been estimated to be necessary in the accomplishment of that result.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the next reservation be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon reservation No. 9, which will be read.

The ninth reservation reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations was read, as follows:

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the result of eight months' consideration and debate on the treaty of peace with Germany, including the proposed League of Nations, has clearly demonstrated three things.

First. That the treaty as originally presented to the Senate by the President is impossible of ratification; that many of its provisions endanger the vital rights of the United States, which never can be and never ought to be surrendered; that the obligations which it contains to other nations surrender on the part of our own country that independence of action in the future which is quite as essential for the welfare of the world as it is necessary for our own protection and development.

Second. That it is absolutely essential to interweave with provisions of any possible ratification such American safeguarding reservations as will entirely protect the rights of our own country.

Third. That the judgment and conscience of more than two-thirds of the Senate of the United States is in full accord with the principle of such American safeguarding reservations, and that the differences which interfere with the expression of the required two-thirds majority of the Senate are differences which are in no sense fundamental.

The 14 reservations which have already been approved by a majority of the Senate do protect every essential interest of our own country, and the mere fact that some of them may, in the judgment of some Senators, protect our own country more than is necessary is no reason for their rejection. It is far safer and wiser to safeguard the essential rights of the United States more than is necessary than to fail in any degree in providing adequate protection, and differences of opinion in regard to the matter ought to yield in favor of our own country.

More than this, when a series of reservations, after months of consideration and debate, have finally been accepted by a majority of the Senate, nothing less than some vital principle which is dangerous to the Republic and obnoxious to conscience or judgment is sufficient warrant for the rejection of a treaty that is so intimately related not only to the future of our own Nation but to the welfare of the world.

So far as I have heard or read what has been spoken upon the floor of this Chamber, I find no serious contention that any one of the reservations is dangerous to the United States or repugnant to the conscience or judgment of the American people. The most that has been said against any of them, or all of them, is that they are either unnecessary, or that they are poorly expressed, or that they go further in their effect than is wise; and I venture to suggest that no one of these reasons is an adequate reason at this time and in a matter of such vast importance for the rejection of the treaty.

It is not now the hour for either side to speak of "surrender," which, in any event, is not the term to apply to differences in phraseology or in regard to principles which are not vital. It is a time for cooperation and for recognition of that rule which is fundamental in the history of the Republic, that what a majority has agreed upon ought to be acquiesced in by the minority even though it may not be in entire accord with their judgment or entirely expressive of their desire. I do not intend even to imply that anyone who, under his oath of office, believes that any one of the reservations threatens or destroys the interests of our own country ought in any sense to support or approve it, nor do I mean that those Senators, whose judgment and conscience lead them to believe that the whole treaty is a dangerous menace to the Republic and ought in its entirety to be rejected, ought to yield their judgment to the mere wish of a majority.

Neither of these positions is true with regard to more than two-thirds of the Senate, who are in their hearts united upon the general proposition that in the interest of business and of peace and of our own country and of the world the treaty, including the League of Nations, ought to be speedily ratified, but that it never ought to be ratified, and that it never can be ratified, without such American safeguarding reservations as absolutely protect our country from the menace to the United States which exists in the treaty as it was originally presented to the Senate. There is nothing sacred in the verbiage of the reservations, but the principle of them is essential.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator from Missouri explain how business will be helped by the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. SPENCER. It will be a delight to me to have the constant presence of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and, if he will remain until my address is over, which will not be more than an hour or two, perhaps his question will be fully answered. May I ask him to wait until I reach the question in its natural order?

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the Senator will it take an hour to explain how business will be aided by the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. SPENCER. Not at all, but at this time it will interfere with the order in which I have arranged the discussion, and if it does not inconvenience the Senator, I would prefer to wait until I reach it in due course, when I will be glad to answer any question of the Senator, so far as I am able to make answer.

Mr. McCORMICK. Very well.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SPENCER. I can well understand how my colleagues upon the other side of the Chamber may hesitate to act in violation of the expressed will of the President of the United States or in contradiction of what they believe to be his position in regard to the matter.

If the President would but consider how difficult he has made it to ratify the treaty, it would seem that some cooperation and help might now be expected by the country from his hands. Any intimation on the part of the President to the Senate that he would not oppose the exercise on its part of its own judgment in the matter, but would leave it free to act as it thought best for the interest of the country, would instantly clarify the situation.

Look at the facts and let the undisputed record speak.

In the first place, the treaty is a one-man treaty. It is the first time this has ever happened in any matter of such importance in the history of our country. Always before this time a treaty was first negotiated either by our ambassador or commissioner, who exercised his best judgment in the matter, and the treaty was then returned to the State Department, who, in the second place, gave it careful consideration. It was then presented to the President, who, in matters of importance, went over the matter himself. There were three independent and careful examinations, which were conducive to safety, and after these three examinations the treaty was then presented to the Senate and was naturally received with all the more confidence because of the careful method pursued in its negotiation.

In the present treaty it is not unfair to say that the President alone dominated the matter from the beginning. He left this country and went across the sea to conduct the negotiations himself. He took with him four estimable gentlemen, but their judgment had no weight whatever. In the question in regard to Shantung at least three if not four of the American commissioners were conscientiously opposed to it, but the President determined upon the transfer of the rights of Germany to Japan and trampled upon the rights of 40,000,000 citizens of our sister Republic of China, and the will of the President controlled, and on the record the United States approved the infamous bargain.

The President was the only representative at the peace conference who did not have back of him some legislative sanction and cooperation. The representatives of England and France and Italy and Japan and every other great nation were in constant touch with their respective Governments, both in conference and in the giving of information. The President alone pursued his own course, without any conference with the country be represented and with special disregard of the Senate, which, by the Constitution of the United States is made his legal adviser, particularly in connection with treaties.

More than this, the treaty of peace with Germany was signed on June 28, 1919. It was immediately transmitted to the Governments of England and of France, and was well known in many circles in those countries who were interested in its terms. The President of the United States gave the Senate no information whatever concerning its terms. Copies of the treaty could be purchased on the streets of London for a small sum of money because of its public nature, and yet the Senate of the United States was kept in absolute ignorance of its terms. By some chance a copy of the treaty was secured from private hands, to whom it had been sent by friends on the other side, and it was read in the Senate for information days before the President condescended to give the Senate any official information on the matter. It was not until July 10, 1919, that the treaty was finally sent to the Senate by the President.

This does not give, by any means, a complete picture of the situation, for the special treaty with France whereby the United States bound itself to come immediately to the assistance of France "in the event of any unprovoked movement of aggression against her being made by Germany" was signed at Versailles on the same date on which the German treaty was signed—June 28, 1919.

The two treaties were not only contemporaneous in time but were intimately connected in relationship, and the President in the French treaty expressly agreed that he would submit the French treaty "to the Senate of the United States at the same time as the treaty of Versailles is submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification."

Not only was this express promise of the President, as contained in the treaty itself, disregarded by him, but no information whatever was officially given to the Senate of either the existence or terms of such treaty. Its provisions were common knowledge upon the streets of Paris and London; and the Senate, through the instrumentality of individuals who had themselves secured from Europe copies of the treaty, was given its first view of the document, for the President did not present to the Senate the French treaty until July 29, 19 days after he had presented the German treaty and more than a month after the French treaty had been agreed to.

Important as these facts are because of the light which they throw upon the attitude of the President with regard to the Senate, they do not and must not in any sense influence our action in regard to the treaty.

The questions raised by the treaty are as far removed from any feeling of personal indignation as they are removed from the field of partisan politics. At most these incidents indicate merely the need of particular care in the consideration of the treaty in order that the rights of our own country may be entirely safeguarded, because manifestly American interests were far in the background in the negotiation of the treaty of Paris.

STATEMENTS BEFORE MISSOURI LEGISLATURE.

I said before the Legislature of Missouri almost a year ago, on March 25, 1919, with regard particularly to the Monroe doctrine but applicable to our domestic questions, that before the treaty ever could be ratified or ever ought to be ratified—

> It must be written in any constitution of the League of Nations to which this Nation is a party, so clear that the wayfaring man may read and understand, that nothing contained therein shall be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

At the same time, regarding the danger to our own independence of action in the future, which threatens this country in the original terms of the treaty, I said that there—> must be incorporated in any constitution of a League of Nations to which we are a party the recognition, not by inference or by interlineary interpretation but by clear, ringing, positive declaration, that in all our relations in the affairs of the world the Constitution of the United States is absolutely supreme in regard to all our obligations and in reference to any act of our conduct. No American soldier or sailor can ever be sent to any place in the world at the dictate of any executive council or any international league without the consent of the American people as expressed by representatives in Congress of the United States.

These fundamental principles, which I have on more than one occasion emphasized on the floor of the Senate, are recognized in the 14 reservations which have already been adopted by a majority of the Senate. They are as vitally essential to-day as they were when the treaty was first presented to the Senate, on July 10, 1919. It is to me inconceivable that any American should hesitate about thus safeguarding the vital interests of our own country.

We are the great stabilizing factor in the world. We have neither in our hearts nor in our history any desire for the territory or possessions of other powers. We possess, perhaps for this very reason, the confidence of the world. In the providence of God we are the richest and strongest Nation on the earth. It is from no lack of sympathy with the problems and difficulties of other nations that we adhere to the fundamental policy of our country to keep free from European entanglements. We are in a far better position in the future to act quickly and impartially in the interest of justice and humanity anywhere if we are not fettered by treaty obligations which may compel us by their very terms to act at variance with our judgment and confidence at the time when action becomes necessary.

All that these reservations, which I like to call American safeguarding reservations, do is to guarantee the independence of action in the future of the United States. We do not decline to help at any time in the future. We do not refuse to bear any burden that may in justice be required of us, but we do say in language that can admit of no misconstruction that we will not at this time obligate ourselves to interfere or to intervene in the disputes and quarrels and difficulties overseas, unless at the time such interference or intervention meets with the approval of the American people. No man can foresee what the history of the world during the next years will be. We look as through a mist and can not discern clearly. No one but God has a vision of what is in store for the world. In that uncertainty of the future how recklessly foolish it is for the United States to tie its hands, as they have never done before in our established international polity of over 100 years, and obligate ourselves to act or not to act in matters which are far remote from us geographically, and which are all the more apt to give us difficulty and trouble if we have thus bound ourselves in advance.

Let us look at the reservations which have been adopted by a majority of the Senate.

As I said in the Senate on September 9, 1919:

"the treaty of peace, as it is now written, will never be ratified by the Senate of the United States, and before it ever receives the sanction of representatives of the people here assembled, reservations similar in effect to those which the Committee on Foreign Relations has already reported must be interwoven with the treaty itself."

RESERVATION NO. 1.

This reservation has to do with the right of the United States to withdraw from the covenant of the League of Nations. It is provided in the covenant itself that on two years' notice any member of the league may withdraw from the league—

"Provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal."

The reservation does not in any sense deprive the President of the United States of the right which he possesses, by virtue of his office, to himself give notice of withdrawal at any time he so elects to do, because the language of the treaty expressly provides that "any member of the league may give notice of withdrawal."

If the United States becomes a member of the league, the one officer, under our Constitution, who represents the United States in international relations is the President. He alone speaks to other nations in the name of this country, and, therefore, notice of withdrawal of the United States may be given by the Chief Executive, and he can give that notice any time he may think best and his act is unimpaired by the reservation as it reads.

The reservation, in addition and not in deprivation of the power of the President, adds to the President's unquestioned power the additional right by concurrent resolution of Congress to give the same notice. Without this reservation it would follow that the President alone could give notice of withdrawal, and it is this situation which the reservation seeks to correct. It is quite within the power of any nation negotiating a treaty to provide in the treaty for any method by which any member may withdraw therefrom, so that if the reservation is adopted it creates a definite method of giving notice of withdrawal by concurrent resolution of Congress, and this concurrent resolution of Congress, because of its being included as a provision of the treaty, would be just as effective without the signature of the President as the power of the President is unquestioned to himself give a notice of withdrawal.

The reservation therefore affords two methods of giving notice of withdrawal, and is a desirable safeguard of the future interests of our country.

If the time ever comes when this country desires to withdraw from the League of Nations, either the President, by virtue of his high office, can himself give the notice of withdrawal or in the event of his failing or refusing so to do Congress is empowered by this reservation to give with equal authority the same notice of withdrawal.

The reservation also provides that if at any time the United States feels constrained to give notice of its withdrawal from the league it shall be entirely free to withdraw at the end of two years after the notice of withdrawal has been given, and that it alone shall be the judge as to whether its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant have been fulfilled.

It is inconceivable that the right of the United States to withdraw from the covenant should in any event be made dependent upon the judgment of other nations whose interest in keeping the United States in the league, even as against the express desire of this country, might easily be so great as to advance fictitious and unwarranted claims of broken obligation on the part of the United States for the very purpose of preventing withdrawal. Just as every great nation is entirely free to enter into an agreement of this kind, so every great nation, after giving the prescribed notice of its intention to withdraw, must be entirely free to withdraw from its identification with the league.

This is in accord with the provisions which are generally inserted in every treaty, which uniformly contains a provision for withdrawal after a prescribed notice.

The reservation simply announces in clear language what Democratic leaders vigorously proclaimed was the intent of the article as it was originally drawn, and it is therefore difficult to understand why there should be any objection to it.

RESERVATION NO. 2.

Reservation No. 2 refers to article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations, which, in many particulars, is the very heart of the league. As the President originally presented to the Senate article 10, it provides that—

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

It will be noticed at a glance that there is no qualification whatever in the absolute obligation of the United States as a member of the league to itself respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every other nation. If this were all, the article in its original form would not be so dangerously objectionable. We always have and we always will respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every other nation.

The obligation, however, reaches far beyond the mere respect of ourselves for the territory or independence of other nations and binds us without qualification to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

In honor this binds the United States to do precisely what the obligation declares, and that is to preserve the territorial integrity of every nation on earth that is a member of the league in case its territory is attacked by any other power. In other words, we are the guarantors of the territorial lines of Egypt, of India, of Bulgaria, of Czechoslovakia, of Greece, of Poland, and of every other Government who either is or who may become a member of the league.

It is quite true that in the latter part of the article it provides that the council "shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled," but this is merely a method by which the unqualified obligation itself may be fulfilled and adds to the difficulty rather than subtracts from it, for if the council did not advise any means there would still remain upon the United States the unqualified obligation which it had assumed to preserve the territorial integrity of other nations, and with this obligation once assumed, when the territorial integrity of any other nation was attacked by external aggression, it at once becomes the sacred duty of the United States to carry out its agreement and to preserve that territory which it has obligated itself to preserve, and this is equally true whether the council advises any particular means by which the obligation is to be carried out or not.

If, on the other hand, the council should advise particularly the means by which the obligation is to be fulfilled—as, for example, to declare the number of troops or method of attack or number of ships which the United States should send, pursue, or transport—we are confronted with a double obligation, first, by our unqualified agreement to act in the matter, and, second—at least morally—by the obligation to follow the advice of the council and to follow it even before any aggression has actually taken place, so that we would be required to send American soldiers or sailors, in accordance with the express terms of the article, at the mere threat of danger of some aggression upon the territory of any Government whose name is or may be signed to the covenant of the League of Nations.

This is not only a clear departure from the uniform, established international policy of this country, but it is as dangerous to-day as it was when George Washington counseled so strongly against precisely such a course of action.

It may be that the time will come when the United States in the cause of justice or humanity may feel called upon to send its Army or its Navy across the sea. If that time comes, the American people will not be found wanting. They never have been found wanting at any call of humanity or of right from wherever it came, but it is the height of folly to bind our hands for the future and at this time to obligate ourselves as a Nation to intermeddle in the future in every territorial dispute that may arise, practically anywhere in the world, whenever any people may seek by external aggression to change or destroy the territorial lines that divide them from another.

It is quite true that the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress alone shall have power to declare war and that the sending of an American Army or American Navy is the equivalent of an act of war, so that the express action of Congress would be necessary before the Army or Navy could be sent. This fact does not by any means answer the objection to article 10 as it is originally written, for candor to the other nations requires us to let them clearly understand not only the mere legal provision behind which we might hide in case they ever called upon us to fulfill the obligations which we would assume if we signed this article as it is written, but as well to let them know that the United States does not intend to hide behind any mere technical defense, but announces in no uncertain language at this time that we will not bind ourselves, either legally or morally, to send our sons to fight in the difficulties and quarrels of Europe at any time or under any circumstances unless, when the occasion arises, the American people through their representatives in Congress believe it is the right thing to do.

It is precisely this principle of American independence of action for the future that is safeguarded by reservation No. 2. This reservation does not change a single word of article 10. It leaves it intact as it was originally written, but it does announce to the world that—

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Under the terms of the reservation there can be no uncertainty in the mind of any nation in the future. No one in the future can point the finger of scorn at this country and accuse us of having obligated ourselves to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations and then, when the necessity for fulfilling that obligation arose, of hiding behind our constitutional bulwark and of failing to stand by the agreement which we had made. It must be clearly written that so far as this country is concerned there is no unqualified agreement or obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any country, and it is this declaration, alike necessary for our own protection and fair to the world that they may know precisely where we stand, that reservation No. 2 is essential.

RESERVATION NO. 3.

The third reservation, like each of the other 14 reservations, does not change a single word of the existing treaty but does safeguard the application of certain provisions of the treaty so far as they relate to the United States. Article 22 of the League of Nations provides that—

> Colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them, and which are inhabited by people not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, shall become "a sacred trust of civilization"— and further provides that the tutelage of such colonies and territories shall be—> entrusted to advanced nations who, by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility.

This third reservation provides with regard to such mandatories that—

> No mandate shall be accepted by the United States except by action of the Congress of the United States—and thus secures for the American people the judgment of their representatives in Congress upon the question as to whether now or in the future this country shall become responsible for the management and development of distant lands. Such tutelage would require the presence of American troops to keep order and American administrators to at least supervise the government and the imposition and the collection of taxes, and would place upon this country in the first instance the responsibility for the government of the people over whom we accepted such guardianship.

It may be that some such mandatory in the interests of humanity will appeal to the United States, but certainly such a departure from our established international policy must not be entered upon without the careful consideration and definite approval of the American people through their representatives in Congress—and that is precisely what this reservation secures.

RESERVATION NO. 4.

Every great power has always reserved for itself the final determination upon matters which are purely domestic. It is inconceivable, for example, that any other country in the world should be allowed any determining voice in regard to the methods of taxation which are to be enforced in the United States, or as to the question of tariff, or with respect to the settlement of conditions with regard to labor, or in respect to any number of other matters which have essentially to do alone with the people of this country.

There are some domestic matters, such as immigration, which are clearly national in their nature, but which may have an international relationship. This principle regarding any domestic questions was clearly recognized in the covenant of the League of Nations, but there was a lamentable failure in the provisions adopted by the conference at Paris to adequately protect it.

The League of Nations provides in article 15 that if any dispute between any nations "is claimed by one of them and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement."

It will be seen, even from a casual examination of this language, that whether a question is domestic or not is, under the provisions of this article, not determined by the nation itself, but by the council of the League of Nations, so that if there should arise a dispute between the United States and Japan with regard to some question of immigration, and the United States should declare, as it undoubtedly would, that the matter was a domestic matter relating entirely to what people this country desired to admit and incorporate in its citizenship and upon what conditions, and that therefore it was a matter which the United States alone must determine, we would find Japan, under the provisions of the League of Nations as it is written, appealing from the opinion of this country to the council of the League of Nations, and it would become a question not for the United States but for the council to adjudge whether or not such dispute had to do with a domestic question, and in this dispute the United States would have no voice whatever, because, being one of the disputants, it is precluded from voting upon the question to which it is a party.

It is inconceivable that any great nation should consent to refer its own domestic questions to the judgment of any other nation or league of nations. These questions are family matters, to be determined alone in the councils of the national family, and it is difficult to understand how any American alive to the interests and rights of his own country could ever have allowed a provision, such as I have quoted, by which the council of the league is given power to determine what are domestic questions, to be written into the covenant.

The reservation safeguards the rights of the United States in this matter. It provides that—

> The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its international affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, tariff, commerce, suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other drugs and all other domestic questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

The importance of some reservation like this is all the more imperative so far as our own country is concerned because of the uncertainty that exists in the interpretation of other sections of the covenant of the League of Nations.

In paragraph (e) of article 23 of the covenant there is a provision by which all the signatory nations agree "to maintain freedom of transit for the commerce of all members of the league."

Does this mean that the commerce of Germany and England shall have free access to the United States? Does it mean that the principle of protective tariff, which has become incorporated in the economic life of this country and upon the safety of which the wages of American labor and the investment of American money in American industry depends, is in any sense to be surrendered or endangered? Is it possible that when the next tariff law is enacted any of the signatory nations to the covenant will be in a position to say to this country:

> You have agreed to give free transit to our commerce and you can not therefore in honor impose any tariff upon our commerce which may interfere with such free transit unless the tariff which you impose is absolutely necessary for revenue.

I do not think this will be the interpretation of this section of the covenant, but no man can say that such an interpretation is impossible or even improbable, and it is to put the matter entirely beyond doubt that the reservation is necessary.

The same necessity for a reservation exists with regard to the subject of immigration. The entire western portion of the United States would rise in arms against any general agreement to admit Japanese or Chinese to this country on terms of equality with other nations and allow them the same rights of naturalization and citizenship which the citizens of other nations enjoy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On the question of traffic, which the Senator has just finished, has any information whatever been given to the world so far as the Senator knows as to what the authors of that provision of the league intend by it or what it does mean in their opinion?

Mr. SPENCER. So far as I am informed, I know of none. The thought came to me when I studied the article, as it doubtless came to the Senator from Connecticut, as being a possible interpretation, though I am free to say it may not be a probable interpretation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will allow me, no one knows what is possible or probable that is to be interpreted by the league itself. From the beginning I have regarded that as one of the most dangerous provisions in the covenant, because, as the Senator knows, the great commercial transactions and the rivalries of different nations in trade in the marts of the world form one of the most prolific causes of dispute, and to have this language agreed upon so that the league could interpret it would be most perilous, in my opinion.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, it is not a question whether this feeling in the western part of our country concerning immigration is either right or fair. There is much that can be said against such a discrimination, but it is folly not to recognize the fact that in our national life such a feeling does exist, and it emphasizes the necessity of the recognized principle that immigration is a matter which every nation must settle entirely for itself.

If Japan were to assert that our immigration policy was not by any means a mere domestic question but that it affected the honor of the Japanese nation, and became, therefore, an international question, she would have strong ground upon which to stand in urging the council of the League of Nations to consider and pass upon the matter. This is all the more true because, under article 4 of the covenant of the League of Nations, the council is expressly authorized to deal with any matter of whatever character that may affect the peace of the world; and, if the insistence of Japan upon her point was vehement, there would arise at once a threatening danger to the peace of the world.

If the council were, because of this fact, to attempt to decide whether the immigration laws of the United States should be sustained or not, it would consider the matter at sessions in which neither Japan nor the United States would have a vote, and if the council, with the United States and Japan both eliminated, should find that our immigration laws were not a matter of domestic jurisdiction, we would be forced into the humiliating position of having our own laws, which we firmly believe are entirely internal in their character, passed upon and either enforced or rejected by the representatives of other nations sitting in a council in which we, because we were parties to the dispute, would have no voice.

Such a position is inconceivable alike to our honor as a nation and to our own safety as a people, and reservation No. 4 absolutely safeguards in this matter the interests of the United States.

RESERVATION NO. 5.

This reservation has to do with the Monroe doctrine of the United States.

The Monroe doctrine of the United States was announced December 2, 1823, nearly 100 years ago, in a message of President Monroe to Congress. It proclaimed to the world the general principle that the United States did not intend to interfere with the problems of Europe, and, on the other hand, that the United States would not look with favor upon any interference by Europe with problems that had to do particularly with the Western Hemisphere. The principle has been somewhat extended, and, with nearly 100 years of acquiescence on the part of the world, it has become established that the United States will not permit any autocracy or monarchy to secure for any reason a foothold upon this hemisphere. North and Central and South America are essentially a territory of Republics. The United States is the greatest Republic of them all. We believe in a form of government by which the people rule, and we do not propose to allow the contagion of monarchies and autocracies to be brought to our very threshold.

No power has ever definiely assented to the principle of the Monroe doctrine. At least twice the principle has been directly involved in international negotiations—once with Great Britain and once with Germany; once under a Democratic President, Mr. Cleveland, and once under a Republican President, Mr. Roosevelt—and each case had to do with Venezuela. In the German case, as I remember, there were certain obligations probably justly due to Germans which rose in Venezuela, and the German Government indicated its intention of seizing some port in Venezuela or taking other steps to enforce the demand, which was believed by them to be the righteous demand of their nationals. The United States interfered and announced that under the Monroe doctrine, while Germany could exert any economic pressure to enforce her claims that she liked, we would not allow her to occupy for a single hour a single foot of Venezuelan territory, because such occupancy would be in violation of our established Monroe doctrine. After diplomatic negotiations, which approached the danger point, and when Germany found that the United States was unchangeable in its determination to defend the Monroe doctrine, she gave a shrug of her diplomatic shoulders and, in effect, said, "Well, if you feel that way about it, let us talk about something else"; and the incident was closed. She had acquiesced in the Monroe doctrine. Great Britain did precisely the same thing when the question arose between the United States and that great country.

The first edition of the League of Nations contained no reference whatever to the Monroe doctrine. American protest in this matter was prompt and general, and the second edition had a grudging reference to the Monroe doctrine, in the following language:

ART. 21. Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to effect the validity of international engagement, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings, like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

No sooner had this provision been made public than the English press and English statesmen gave clear expression to their interpretation of the matter, and it was all to the effect that under this provision the United States had surrendered its Monroe doctrine as a great national policy and that whether or not any matter in the future involved the Monroe doctrine would be a question not for the United States to determine, but for the council of the League of Nations to pass judgment upon. The Yorkshire Post, in its issue of February 1, 1919, clearly stated:

It is admitted that unless the Monroe doctrine is definitely abandoned by the United States the formation of a League of Nations is impossible. It would be ridiculous to attempt it.

If no other greater reason compels us, we should in fairness to other nations announce without equivocation and by a declaration, clear and positive and unmistakable, that the United States does not relinquish or diminish its traditional attitude toward purely American questions in the least, and that the Monroe doctrine in all its integrity is to be preserved in the future as it has been in the past.

The Monroe doctrine is essentially an American principle. It can have to do with no other nation. It is peculiar to ourselves. It results from our geographical situation and our political form of government. It is applicable to no other people as it is to the people of these United States. It is as ridiculous to speak of making the Monroe doctrine a principle of universal application as it is to declare that the American method by which party conventions select their respective candidates for President should generally be adopted in the world. Each represents a peculiar American matter and is not capable of being applied to all parts of the world.

The cause for it rests fundamentally in the need for our own protection against the encroachment of foreign methods of government inconsistent with our own governmental ideals.

Mr. President, I call attention to a single illustration of the need of the doctrine in our own interests, which is along a line evidently not contemplated by the conference at Paris. It seems as if those who wrote article 10 of the League of Nations had in mind, and wisely had in mind, the prevention of external aggression upon the territorial integrity of any other nation, because such external aggression breeded war, and war was the thing which the League of Nations wanted to make impossible. They failed, however, to recognize that there may be external aggression upon the territorial integrity of another nation which is an absolutely essential aggression on the part of the invading government, and in no case is that more clear than with the United States.

If we had a map of the United States upon the wall, we could refresh our memory by looking at the State of California. At the south of the State of California there extends southward that long peninsula which is called Lower California. It has little agricultural value. The cost of irrigation that would make it agriculturally available is prohibitive. But it has upon its western border the Bay of Magdalena, the most wonderful assembling ground for a navy upon the whole Pacific coast, except perhaps the port of San Francisco, and it has great fields that lend themselves to the mobilization of an army.

Lower California belongs to Mexico. Mexico has long wanted to sell. The distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has upon more than one occasion advocated the acquisition of Lower California upon the part of this Government by purchase. Mexico has been seeking a purchaser. Japan has wanted to buy. I do not know, nor does any other Senator upon the floor of the Senate know, that Japan has not already bought Lower California. When there is an article in commerce and he who has it is keen to sell and is met by some one eager to buy and unmindful of the price, the consummated sale is apt to follow. If Japan has bought it, or if Japan should buy it, it immediately has become or would become the territorial integrity of Japan. They have as much right to buy Lower California as we had to buy the Virgin Islands from Denmark not long ago. If that sale has been completed, or should be completed in the future, what stands in the way of the transaction? Nothing in the world except the announcement and the enforcement of our own Monroe doctrine. If we could imagine the Japanese ambassador sitting upon one side of the table and the Mexican ambassador sitting upon the other side of the table negotiating about Lower California, and could witness the conclusion when the Japanese ambassador said, "There is your money," and the Mexican ambassador replied, "There is your deed," the transaction would be complete. If either one of them had lifted his eyes ever so little, he would have seen the strong uplifted arm of the manhood of the United States declaring to the ambassador of Japan, "You dare not buy," and to the ambassador of Mexico, "You dare not sell property that shall come under the domination of Japan and that lies upon the threshold of the American Republic."

Yet, with that sale consummated, or to be consummated, and with Lower California a part of the territorial integrity of Japan, there is not a man in the Senate who does not know that the news of that transaction would not be 24 hours old before an American Army would be marching to Lower California, and the Japanese outposts upon the point of Magdalena Bay would see the smoke of American men-of-war advancing to drive out the Japanese fleet from its assembly grounds. When the American troops came on their way, and the American fleet proceeded toward the bay, under this treaty what would Japan do? She would say to England and to France and to Italy, the nations whose sons have mingled their blood with the blood of our own, "Come; the United States by external aggression is invading my territorial integrity, and I demand of France and England and Belgium and Italy that you rally around me and fight with me to offset the American Army that I see advancing and the American Navy that is steaming toward my shores." If France and England and Italy and Belgium kept their word as it is written in this treaty, they would be bound to come to the assistance of Japan as against the United States.

The only ground we have upon which to stand in a case like this is the Monroe doctrine itself, for with that doctrine clearly established we could incontrovertibly assert, not alone to Japan but to every other nation, that such acquisition of territory was in violation of the established and recognized and proclaimed right of the United States, as set forth in the Monroe doctrine.

The fifth reservation which protects this matter is brief and clear and unanswerable. It reads as follows:

The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone, and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. I was much interested in the illustration which the Senator gave in regard to the Monroe doctrine, and I should like to ask the Senator this question: Supposing that the Central and South American Republics join the League of Nations and the United States does not join, then, in the case which the Senator mentions of Mexico deeding Lower California to Japan, how could we defend the Monroe doctrine? Could not Mexico say in that case: "We have formed a new world alliance under the league, and therefore the Monroe doctrine is no longer in force; we do not recognize it; we stand upon our sovereign rights secured to us under the League of Nations." Therefore, in the illustration which the Senator drew, if the United States kept out of the league, would she not stand alone, with the nations of the world against her, and would not the Monroe doctrine then fall to the ground?

Mr. SPENCER. I thank the Senator for the interruption and for the helpful statement which he has made. Undoubtedly it is true that in the case which the Senator announces we would have to depend for the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine upon our own national strength, together with the help of any nations that might agree with us. If the reservation to which I have referred is adopted and under it we enter the League of Nations, we then have the Monroe doctrine clearly proclaimed as an American doctrine, and back of our enforcement of the Monroe doctrine we have not only our own strength but the protecting power of the covenant of the League of Nations itself.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, may I not ask the Senator whether, in case we join the league, the other nations, as well as ourselves, are not bound to uphold the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. SPENCER. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. COLT. And, further, if we enter the league, are not the nations of the world also bound by the Monroe doctrine as a doctrine of international law?

Mr. SPENCER. I think the Senator is quite right, provided this reservation is written into the treaty, in his conclusion that with the Monroe doctrine clearly proclaimed as an American policy it would have an international standing far more secure than it now has.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to trespass upon his time?

Mr. SPENCER. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. KING. If I understood the position of the Senator from Rhode Island, it was that if the United States failed to sign the treaty and become a party to the league, the Monroe doctrine, so far as the South American Republics were concerned, would fall to the ground and be inoperative.

If I understand the position of the Senator correctly, I do not think that position is tenable, and yet I would defer very much to the superior knowledge of the learned Senator from Rhode Island. The treaty itself, without our being a signatory to it, contains a recognition of the Monroe doctrine. I concede, of course, that the interpretation placed upon it by many, wherein the language is used that it is a regional understanding, leads them to give a different exposition to the treaty and to the meaning of the treaty than that for which I contend. But, assuming that those words do imply a recognition of the Monroe doctrine, whether you call it a regional understanding or a rule of international law, it is named there as a fact; it is recognized as an understanding; and if it is only a regional understanding rather than an international understanding, I insist, nevertheless, that the Monroe doctrine would be preserved and is recognized in the treaty whether we become signatories to the treaty or not; and therefore the South American Republics could rely upon the Monroe doctrine if they desired; or, rather, say that it was in force, even though the United States did not join the League of Nations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him, if I understood him correctly: Does he claim that if we enter the league under the reservation in relation to the Monroe doctrine already adopted by the Senate, the other members of the league have thereby recognized the Monroe doctrine as binding upon them as a doctrine of international law, as stated by the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SPENCER. I wish that were true, but it is not true.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I misunderstood the Senator, then. As I understand, all they would agree to, if they accepted this reservation as required by the preamble, is that we shall be the sole interpreters of our Monroe doctrine; but they do not bind themselves to recognize it as we may interpret it.

Mr. SPENCER. No; and there is no definition of the Monroe doctrine, either in the covenant or in the reservation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. SPENCER. But, undoubtedly, if we entered into the league with the reservation concerning the Monroe doctrine also incorporated in the covenant, we would then have an international recognition of our right alone to interpret the Monroe doctrine, which we have not to-day; and if we do not go into the League of Nations, then we would have our right to alone interpret the Monroe doctrine, backed by ourselves and backed by any other nation that might acquiesce or agree with our view, but not necessarily backed by all the nations signatory to the covenant, as it would be if we went into the League of Nations and the reservation were made a part of the covenant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Provided the other members of the league accept the reservation.

Mr. SPENCER. Quite true.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SPENCER. I do.

Mr. COLT. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, I beg to say a word in reply to the Senator from Utah.

The Monroe doctrine is essentially a doctrine of the United States of America. The Central and South American Republics view it with some apprehension. They do not like, in a way, the overlordship. Now, if the Central and South American States join this new alliance of the league, they will regard themselves as outside of the protecting power of the Monroe doctrine. Hence, if we do not join the League of Nations, and they form a new alliance, notwithstanding the indefinite language that there is in the covenant, I maintain that the Monroe doctrine as an American doctrine falls to the ground.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator from Missouri for his courtesy.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Rhode Island will pardon me, I desire again to express my dissent from the position which he has taken and the very clear exposition which he has given of the Monroe doctrine. I do not wish to assent to his proposition, nor do I wish to dissent from it, that by the affirmation of the Monroe doctrine we have infringed upon the sovereignty of the Republics to the south of us. That is a question that is rather delicate to discuss. But, Mr. President, I do deny the proposition that if we fail to join the League of Nations and the Republics to the south of us do become members of the League of Nations the Monroe doctrine is overthrown and, to use the language of the Senator, those Republics would take refuge under this new alliance.

Will the Senator permit me just to invite attention to article 21?

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine.

Those Republics to the south of us, if they join the League of Nations and we do not give approval to that section to which I have just called attention, recognize the Monroe doctrine as a valid and subsisting regional or international obligation or understanding. I do not care whether you call it an international or whether you call it a regional understanding. They would recognize it as a living, vital force or power, moral or legal, I do not care how you designate it, existing in the world, and they would be subject to it, and they would express their approval of it by becoming members of the League of Nations.

Mr. COLT. Does the Senator believe that Mexico would recognize it?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator has just assumed, in the position he has taken, that they do join the League of Nations, and the only reply I am making is based upon the assumption in which the Senator indulged. The Senator said in his very first sentence that if these Republics to the south of us join the League of Nations and we do not, then the Monroe doctrine is overthrown, because they will take refuge in this new alliance; and, predicating the remarks which I have made upon the supposition which he has given, I am assuming that they have joined the League of Nations; and if they join the League of Nations, then they approve of the Monroe doctrine, and they will call it into recognition or may call it into recognition, so far as they have the power to do so, whether they are in the League of Nations or not. Of course, I admit that it is unilateral that we alone could enforce the Monroe doctrine; but, at any rate, there is no repudiation of the Monroe doctrine by them if they join the League of Nations and we do not, but, upon the contrary, so far as they can they approve of the Monroe doctrine and give it the same sanctity and the same solemnity and the same international obligation as if we became a member of the League of Nations.

I thank the Senator from Missouri for his very great courtesy.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, reservation No. 6 has nothing to do with the League of Nations, but relates to one of the shameful provisions of the treaty of peace itself. It withholds the sanction of the United States from those infamous proposed sections—156, 157, and 158—of the treaty by which all the rights which Germany claimed in China are turned over to Japan. These provisions are the culmination of a long series of unjust and regrettable international arrangements, every one of which is repugnant to that sense of justice which fortunately pervades the United States and which, please God, may in this country never be diminished or destroyed. In brief, the history of it is as follows:

In 1896 and 1897 Germany indicated clearly her determined policy to acquire for herself territory in China.

In 1898 when two Christian ministers of German citizenship had been killed by a mob, Germany promptly seized the opportunity of making this unfortunate incident a basis for the peremptory demand of the desired rights in Shantung. It had no more foundation in justice than, as has been well said, would exist if as a result of mob violence in the city of Baltimore a citizen of Great Britain should be killed and the unfortunate incident should be made the demand for the cession to England of the Chesapeake Bay and its adjacent territory.

Soon after the war broke out in 1914 the Chinese Government was anxious to expel the German forces from Chinese territory, and under the circumstances was able to do so. This would have brought China directly into the war, but Japan with great vigor insisted that China should not act in the matter and prevented her entrance into the war upon the side of the Allies, while Japan herself, at an almost negligible cost of men or material resources, dispossessed Germany from her Chinese possessions. It is significant that Japan in thus dispossessing Germany did not content herself alone with the acquisition of the territory which Germany had acquired but landed her troops a hundred and fifty miles in the interior and took military control of a far greater extent of territory than Germany had ever possessed.

In 1915 Japan, by the threat of force and by dominating diplomatic insistence, compelled an unwilling China to agree that the rights of Germany should on the termination of the war be transferred to Japan. Japan with great cunning secured, owing to the stress of world conditions, a secret agreement from England and France and Italy that they would consent in the final treaty with Germany to such acquisition by Japan of all Germany's rights.

It is, as I have said before, inconceivable that the representatives of the United States at the peace table who have asserted that the first knowledge they ever had of any such agreement between England, France, Italy, and Japan regarding Shantung came to them at Paris should ever have consented to proceed with the negotiations until these secret arrangements of such vital importance to the future welfare of the world were by the consent of all parties thereto entirely abrogated, so that the conference at Paris might begin their negotiations unencumbered by secret arrangements of which the United States had no prior information. One would have thought that the President—who has himself asserted that he had never before heard of this agreement between England and Italy and France and Japan, by which Japan was to receive the territory which Germany held in China, and that he first learned of it in Paris—would promptly have said to his associates something like this:

"Gentleman, I learn for the first time of the secret treaty which you have made between yourselves. I do not impugn the motive or the necessity which may have been the cause of its original creation, but as we now come together to consider the welfare of the world, and to consider it alone upon the principles of honor and of justice, I say to you in the name of the United States that before we enter upon this conference that secret treaty, by the consent of every one of you who formed it, must now be laid upon the table and canceled, in order that we may proceed, unfettered by secrecy, to do now what is right in the matter. I will not enter into a conference with my hands tied by a secret arrangement concerning which I had no information whatever."

But such action was not taken at Paris. The treaty of peace was negotiated with provisions which did give to Japan the very territory in China which England and France and Italy had secretly agreed with Japan should be given to her, and that treaty is now an accomplished fact and in practical operation. Germany has already ceded her rights in Shantung to Japan. Japan is in actual possession of this part of the Shantung Peninsula, and nothing that we can do will dispossess her unless, indeed, by very force we eject her from the peninsula.

If we adopt amendments, as some have urged, which expressly cede Shantung to China and take Shantung away from Japan, we ought to make it effective.

If the United States in its wisdom actually transfers territory from Japan to China, we ought to see to it that such transfer on our part is accomplished, otherwise it is nothing but a verbal bubble that by its very lack of substance suggests its insincerity.

Is it not also apparent that by amendments to the treaty, whether we proceed to enforce them by war or not, we are intermeddling in the most aggravating manner in the quarrels and disputes of the Far East? We seek to change an existing condition of territory of which we disapprove, and not only express our disapproval but actually take the disputed territory and give it to another. There could be no greater intermeddling in the affairs of the Far East than this.

If we adopt amendments we are not helping China in the least. We do not change by a hair's breadth the existing condition of Japan's possession of the Shantung Peninsula. We do nothing more than create a diplomatic situation which renders real help to China more difficult in the future.

Amendments to the treaty in this matter would be as unwise as they would be ineffective.

The reservation does not change the provision of the treaty, infamous though it is, because such a change is impossible in the situation in which we now find Japan and China; but it does provide that—

The United States withholds its consent to articles 156, 157, and 158 and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under such articles.

We place upon that Shantung provision of the treaty the stamp of our disapproval, and we absolutely refuse to sanction it or to become a party to it, and we practically give notice to the world that at the first opportunity we will in every way in our power attempt to correct that great iniquity.

Consistent with the purpose that runs through every reservation, we leave the future action of this country in this matter unfettered, and refusing the consent of the United States to the iniquitous surrender of Shantung to Japan, we hold ourselves free in the future to act in the matter as opportunity may permit and justice may require.

RESERVATION NO. 7.

This reservation has nothing to do with the League of Nations, but does refer to the many provisions of the treaty itself which provide for a large number of necessary commissions, committees, and other tribunals to consider and adjust questions of reparation and boundaries and values growing out of the complicated details of the treaty itself.

In many of these commissions it is provided in the treaty that the United States shall have a representative. In very few of them is it either wise or necessary that the United States should take any part. They have mostly to do with matters that affect the nations involved and only the nations involved. Our country neither sought nor is it now claiming any of the territory of the enemy. We never have had and do not now advance any desire for the land of other nations, nor do we seek indemnity for the enormous cost in which the war involved us. Therefore, the necessity of our participation in these essentially European matters is not apparent.

Wherever the interests of the United States can be at all affected by the action of any commission, tribunal, or committee, we must, of course, have a representative. But where the interest of the United States is not at all concerned there can be no need for any American representative, unless, in a comparatively few cases, our connection with such a tribunal might be desirable as an act of courtesy to our allies and of help in the difficult problems of adjustment.

The reservation itself does not change the composition of a single committee or commission or tribunal, but it does provide that there shall be no American representatives appointed except in accordance with such provision therefor as may be made by the Congress of the United States.

In other words, the reservation declares the principle that the American people, through their representatives in Congress, must first determine whether the United States ought to have representation on these European commissions, and when it has been so determined to provide for their appointment and powers and duties.

RESERVATION NO. 8.

This reservation, like its predecessor, has nothing to do with the League of Nations itself, but deals entirely with a provision of the treaty.

In the treaty the provision in regard to a reparation commission gives to that commission large powers which are so broad in their language as to warrant the fear that in carrying out their plans they may establish regulations or rules which shall vitally interfere with exports of the United States into Germany or with imports into the United States from Germany, and the reservation safeguards the rights of our own country only to the extent of providing that so far as this country is concerned it must be understood that no decision of the reparation commission can effect American exports or imports without the approval of the Congress of the United States.

It may be that there is no necessity for this reservation and that the reparation commission will not in any event interfere with American exports or American imports. If such is the final interpretation of the treaty, then, at most, this reservation would be mere surplusage and can not in any event work any injustice to any nation. On the other hand, if the reparation commission should attempt to interfere with American exports or American imports, the necessity of some such American safeguarding reservation as the one now being considered is most manifest.

The reservation is brief, and reads as follows:

The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

RESERVATION NO. 9.

No one knows what will be the expense of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat provided by its terms, or of the commissions, committees, or other agencies which are set up by the treaty. An estimate has already been made by an intelligent and experienced accountant, who is himself familiar with international matters and a lawyer of standing, and who asserts that the annual cost of carrying out the League of Nations and the accompanying treaty provisions will amount to over $1,000,000,000.

In my own judgment this amount is tremendously in excess of any possible cost that may accrue, but in any event there will be a substantial amount of money which it will be necessary to provide, and the treaty requires that all the costs incident to the carrying out of these provisions shall be borne by the respective nations in the same proportion in which these nations bear the expense of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

The reservation does not change the liability of the United States to provide its full share of any necessary expense, but it does clearly announce to the other nations that before the United States can be called upon for money for these purposes there must be an actual appropriation of funds for that purpose by the Congress of the United States. The reservation carries out a wise business rule that there must be an estimated budget of required expense and provision made for payment before definite obligations are created.

The reservation reads as follows:

The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

RESERVATION NO. 10.

Article 8 of the covenant of the League of Nations very wisely recognizes—that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

In effectuating this principle the same article provides that the council of the League of Nations, after an examination of the military and naval strength of each nation, and with due consideration to its geographical situation and circumstances, shall formulate a suggested plan for the reduction of national armament by each nation and shall submit that plan to the nation concerned.

It is further provided that if such nation, on consideration of the proposed plan for the reduction of its armament, shall consent thereto, that in such event such consenting nation shall not in any event subsequently increase its armament as thus agreed upon without the consent of the council.

It is a provision that has much merit and is well worth a trial. The Senate, however, quickly realized that even though the United States might agree to such a reduction of its Army and its Navy, nevertheless that there might come an occasion when, in the event of an attack upon the United States by a foreign foe, there would be an immediate necessity of increasing its Army or its Navy, and that there would be no time to secure the consent of the council, especially because, under the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations, to obtain such consent it would require a unanimous vote of the council, so that any objecting nation might prevent the United States from thus protecting itself against invasion.

The reservation safeguards this situation and provides that this country reserves to itself the right "to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war." It is difficult to understand how any American can have the slightest objection to such a reservation which so clearly stands for the protection of his own country.

RESERVATION NO. 11.

Under article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations it is provided that in case any member of the league shall "resort to war in disregard of its covenants" that it shall "ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all the other members of the league," and that every member of the league shall thereupon immediately subject the offending nation to "severance of all trade or financial relations, prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not."

In other words, this section of the covenant of the League of Nations, with a great deal of wisdom, provides a certain economic punishment to be meted out to any nation who violates the agreement it has made in becoming a member of the League of Nations, and, in carrying out of this economic punishment, it requires every nation to at once enforce a suspension of all business relations between those people who are under its control—its nationals—and the people of the covenant-breaking State.

If, for example, Greece or Italy should violate the covenant which it had assumed, it would be the duty of the United States as well as of the other nations who were members of the league to promptly impose upon Greece and Italy the economic pressure which would follow from at once terminating all business relationship between the citizens of the United States or others under its control with the citizens of Greece or Italy.

The provision of this article of the covenant of the League of Nations is so broadly drawn that in the illustration which I have just given it would require the United States to cease all business connection with any citizens of Greece or of Italy who might be living within the borders of our own country at the time. In other words, if it became necessary for this country to carry out this provision of the covenant of the League of Nations as against Italy or Greece, it would follow that no American could have his shoes shined in a place where Greek boys were doing the work, because that would be the transaction of business between nationals of the United States and nationals of Greece.

It would prevent any citizen of the United States from buying any fruit from an Italian fruit vender for precisely the same reason. It would absolutely terminate any business relation of any kind, however insignificant, which any citizens of this country might desire to have with any citizens of Italy or Greece wherever it was intended to carry on that business.

All that the reservation does is to limit the provision of this economic pressure by providing that in our discretion we may permit our nationals to deal with the nationals of the covenant-breaking States who reside in this country or who are living outside of the territory of the covenant-breaking country, so that in case we were required to discontinue all business relations with Italy or with Greece, we would not be put in the absurd and difficult position of breaking our own solemn obligation if we had dealings at home with such citizens of Greece or of Italy as might at the time be residing in the United States or in Canada or in any other place outside of Greece or Italy while it would leave the entire article in full force with regard to all commercial relationships between this country and the nations of Greece or Italy.

RESERVATION NO. 12.

This reservation also has nothing to do with the League of Nations, but relates mainly to sections 296, 297, and annexes thereto, of the treaty itself. These two articles of the treaty have to do with the settlement of the debts and property rights and interests which were interfered with by the war and which were due when war was declared or became due while the war was in progress between the nationals of the United States and its associates on the one side and the opposing nations upon the other side.

There is a large amount of property belonging to citizens of Germany which was taken possession of by this country because it was in this country at the time of the war, and there is a certain amount of property belonging to the citizens of the United States which was taken possession of by Germany because it was in Germany at the time of the war. There is a vast amount of property interests of one kind and another belonging to citizens of the respective nations which must be adjusted now that the war is over, and in these two sections of the treaty, and also in other parts of the treaty, there are provisions made for adjustment of these debts and property rights and interests.

The reservation provides that in the settlement of these matters it must be clearly understood that the United States, if it signs the treaty, does not confirm nor ratify nor approve any act in connection with such adjustment that is in contravention of rights of citizens of the United States or is in violation of law. It is another one of those protective reservations which safeguard the property and rights of American citizens and leaves our own country with its hands unbound so that it is free at any time to assert and secure the rights of our own citizens if they have been in any sense violated in the carrying out of the treaty provisions. In other words, the United States announces to all the other nations that it regards itself as entirely free at any time to protect the property rights of Americans if in any event they have been illegally violated.

RESERVATION NO. 13.

Reservation No. 13 relates to part 13 of the treaty of peace, which is composed of articles 387 to 427, inclusive and has to do with labor and has for its wise purpose the promotion of social justice and provides for a permanent organization with representatives from all contracting nations.

There is much that might be said in connection with this exceedingly important part of the treaty. Injustice and hardship to the labor of a country is not only an unwarranted burden upon those who are directly affected, but is a menace to the safety of the nation itself. This is true anywhere in the world, but it is essentially true in our own country, where the distinction of class or birth does not exist; where every citizen is upon an absolute equality with every other citizen; where the unknown stranger who may be laboring with his hands to-day becomes a leader of the people, with tremendous power in his hand, to-morrow. As the Supreme Court of the United States once put it, in this country "every citizen is a constituent part of the sovereignty itself."

I remember upon one occasion when President Garfield visited the city of St. Louis it was related that a dirty, barefooted boy upon the street, in the excess of his enthusiasm, waved his ragged hat and shouted, "Hurrah for Garfield!"

The President from his carriage noticed the boy and lifted his high hat in a return of the salutation. Some representative of a foreign power, who was seated with the President, with manifest interest inquired: "May I ask, Mr. President, why you took off your hat to that dirty ragamuffin?" The President instantly replied: "Because that American boy, like Abraham Lincoln before him, may himself become the President of this Republic."

It is illustrative of the unlimited opportunity before every American boy and emphasizes the peculiar necessity in these United States that absolute justice should be meted out to all citizens alike, irrespective of their birth or creed or occupation.

When it comes, however, to the actual operation of the provisions of this portion of the treaty which has to do with labor, it may well be asked whether in the interest of American labor, which is the most intelligent, most efficient, best paid, best living labor in all the world, we ought to place the American workingman even in conference on a par with the workingman of other nations whose working conditions and mode of living and amount of compensation are so greatly inferior because there is a certain amount of leveling downward in such conferences as is so well established with regard to currency.

We know that if gold and paper money come in conflict the gold is at once driven out of circulation and the inferior currency predominates. If American labor is in any sense bound in its relationship with the inferior labor of other parts of the world it is well worth considering as to whether the result of such obligation may not lessen in some degree the position of advantage which American labor now has and so richly deserves. In any event what the reservation provides is that in case the United States does participate in such an international labor organization and does involve American labor with the labor of the world it shall be only under such conditions and with such protection as the American people may, through Congress, provide for the safety of American citizens.

The reservation reads:

13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

RESERVATION NO. 14.

The last reservation has to do with equality of representation in the assembly and, as I shall expect to show, in the council of the League of Nations.

Under the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations each member of the league, irrespective of its size, shall have one vote in the assembly, which is made up of representatives of all the members of the league. Each member may have three representatives therein, but in no event can any member have more than one vote. This enables the United States to have one vote in the assembly. The British Empire, as such, is a member of the league and is entitled to one vote in the assembly, and in addition it is expressly provided that Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India shall each be members of the league, and shall therefore each have a vote in the assembly, so that Great Britain has in the assembly six votes and the United States has but one.

This inequality of representation is not pleasant for an American to approve, even though it is true that under article 5 of the covenant of the League of Nations all decisions of the assembly, except where otherwise expressly provided, require an agreement of "all the members of the league represented at the meeting."

There is much safety in this provision of unanimity, but it is not at all adequate in remedying the inequality of representation, as I shall endeavor to demonstrate. In the first place, the assembly may, by a mere majority vote, pass upon all matters with regard to procedure and to the appointment of committees, and this power has far-reaching effect. More than this, the very fact that Great Britain has in the assembly six votes upon every question gives to her an undue influence not only because of her six votes in any particular matter under discussion but because of her sixfold power in the assembly, for no nation can fail to recognize that Great Britain is in possession of six votes and the United States is entitled to but one. There are, however, far more serious objections to this inequality of representation than those I have already mentioned, because the composition of the council itself may be at stake.

The council is the executive agent of the League of Nations. It has power as great as the assembly itself. It deals with every question in the world that may threaten the peace of the world. It is composed of nine representatives from nine nations. Five of them are permanent and consist of the representatives of the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, and four members of the council are to be selected by the assembly—and I call particular attention to the use of the word "selected"—from time to time as in its discretion it may care to act. For the present the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece constitute the other four members of the council. It is expressly provided that the assembly may at any time "select" the representatives of any other member of the league to take the place of these four temporary members.

The President, in connection with representatives of France and Great Britain, officially announced—and, in my judgment, correctly so—that under the provisions of the League of Nations Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India were eligible to membership in the council.

It is perfectly manifest that if in any event four of the British colonies should be selected as members of the council it would give to Great Britain in the council not only the vote of the British Empire, which is already represented on the council, but as well the vote of her four colonies, which would constitute a majority of the entire council. The answer is made at once by those who do not believe that this reservation is necessary that in no event could there be any election to the council without the consent of the United States, and that therefore the United States is entirely safe in the matter. It is not by any means clear that this answer is either well founded in law or in any sense sufficient to meet the difficulty, for it will be remembered that the assembly "selects four members of the council," and by every rule of legal nomenclature "selection" is not a decision.

Under article 5 of the covenant of the League of Nations all decisions of the assembly, except where otherwise expressly provided in the covenant, require a unanimous vote.

A decision is an act of settling or terminating a controversy by giving judgment on the matter at issue.

A decision is not a selection. A court gives a decision when it passes judgment upon the matters which are in dispute and which have been submitted to the court for its decision. The court does not in any legal sense render a decision when it acts in its administrative capacity and appoints some man as clerk or official reporter.

In a general sense undoubtedly the selection of a member of the council may be called a decision, but it must be remembered that the language of the covenant of the League of Nations was drawn by those who were skilled in the use of terms in their legal and diplomatic meaning, and under a familiar rule language thus used is to be interpreted in accordance with such legal or diplomatic meaning.

If therefore the mere selection of a member of the council is not regarded as technically a "decision" of the assembly, it follows inevitably that in the selection of members of the council only a majority of the assembly is necessary to make a selection, and if this is true it would be quite within the power of Great Britain, having 6 votes in the assembly with all the attendant influences which such a preponderance of voting power naturally gives, to secure the support of a majority of the assembly and elect as representative in the council four members of her own self-governing colonies, with the result that Great Britain would have five out of nine members of the council.

I do not believe that Great Britain has now or ever did have any such intention, nor do I say that the interpretation which I have outlined is beyond any doubt a correct interpretation to be given to the provisions of the covenant as they are written; but no man can say that such an interpretation is impossible, and it involves a matter of such great and grave importance to the United States that every instinct of self-preservation would lead us to guard against even the possibility of such vital danger.

The most ardent advocate of the treaty in its original form would not for a moment contend that Great Britain ought in any event to have five votes in the council of nine as against one vote of the United States, and every advocate of the treaty in its original form would undoubtedly admit that, other things being equal, it is desirable that in the assembly, even bearing in mind the rule of unanimity which the covenant prescribes, the United States should have a representation as large as any other nation.

The language of the reservation makes safe for the United States both the existing inequality of representation in the assembly and the possible inequality of representation in the council. It does not diminish in the least the right of the self-governing colonies of Great Britain to have representation in the assembly. Their participation in the war and their economic and political strength in the world may well entitle them to such recognition, but it must be clearly understood that in any decision or finding or election or report of either the assembly or the council the United States is not forced to abide by such result in the event that any nation, including its self-governing colonies, casts more than one vote in the decision, and this is precisely what the reservation provides.

There is another feature in connection with this inequality of representation which can not in the interests of the United States be overlooked, and that has to do with the possible disputes or differences that may arise in the future between our country and the British Empire or any of its colonies or with any other nation.

If there should arise any matter of dispute between the United States and England which it was impossible to satisfactorily settle by diplomacy, then, under article 15 of the covenant of the League of Nations, such dispute would, in case either side was of the opinion that it was not a matter which ought to be judicially submitted to a board of arbitration, be automatically submitted to the council with the right in either party to transfer the consideration of the question from the council, with its nine members, to the assembly, with its representatives from all the members of the league.

In the consideration of the dispute by the assembly neither the United States nor England, who are themselves parties to the dispute, would be allowed a voice in the decision, but there is nothing whatever in the covenant of the League of Nations that would prevent the five self-governing colonies of Great Britain from participating in the decision of the dispute between the British Empire and the United States. It is only fair to say that in all probability the sense of fairness which so essentially characterizes the Anglo-Saxon race would keep the British Empire or any of its colonies from voting upon any question in which any one of them was interested, and in any event it is well understood, both from the letter of Lord Grey and from the general expressions of the English press and English statesmen, that there is no objection whatever on the part of Great Britain to any American safeguarding reservation in this particular; but even if there were objection the very possibility of five British colonies voting upon any dispute between the United States and England is inconceivable, and the United States must, precisely as it does by this reservation, safeguard its own interests in this particular.

The need of the reservation is equally clear if we consider the possibility of a dispute between the United States and Japan. In such an event when the question at issue came before the assembly neither the United States nor Japan would have any participation in its decision, because both of them are parties to the dispute, but the British Empire and its five self-governing colonies would together have six members of the tribunal, and this preeminence of membership, with its corresponding predominance of influence, would place in one nation a power which, in the interests of fairness and equality, never ought to exist.

It may well be true that in a majority of disputes between the United States and any other nation the judgment of Great Britain and her colonies would be apt to coincide with the position taken by this country, and to that extent a predominance of her power would be an advantage to the United States; but an advantage which rests upon a manifest inequality and upon an unfair preponderance of power is neither desirable from the standpoint of honor nor, in the long run, is it advantageous from the standpoint of expediency.

There is still a third possibility in which this inequality of representation would work to the disadvantage of our country, and it rises in case of a dispute between two nations other than the United States or British Empire, including its colonies. If we imagine a dispute between Japan and China which, in the natural order of procedure, as I have indicated, comes to the assembly for consideration and judgment—and it may be a matter in which the United States is vitally interested—we find that in that tribunal the United States has but a single vote, while England and her colonies have six votes, and it requires no stretch of the imagination to picture the preponderating influence of a nation that can itself command six votes in the court as against any other nation who can command but one vote. This preponderance of power is not only present in the instant case which may at the moment be before the court for consideration, but it is a continuing demonstration to every nation in the world that the one government which has the controlling influence in the assembly is the nation having at its disposal six times as many judges as any other nation, and the effect of it is with magnetic force to attach to those six votes of the British Empire an increasing number of votes from smaller nations, who naturally are inclined to adhere to that country which is in a position to be of such tremendous advantage to themselves in case of need.

Here is what the reservation actually provides. It does not change in the least the representation of Great Britain or of her colonies or dominions. It does not even enlarge the representation of the United States, but it does absolutely safeguard our country against any possible harm that might result from such inequality, for in unmistakable language it reads:

> The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have cast more than one vote, and assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

DO THE RESERVATIONS DESTROY THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS?

The query naturally arises in the mind of everyone interested in the treaty and League of Nations as to whether or not the provisions of the treaty and of the league, which are manifestly worth a trial and which may be of tremendous force in safeguarding the future peace of the world, are in any sense destroyed or rendered incapable of efficient operation by any or all of the 14 reservations which are proposed.

It may be said in passing that the reservations do not in any sense require any reassembling of the peace conference. The treaty of peace, including the League of Nations, is already in operation. Nothing that we can do or fail to do can change this actual fact. Germany has agreed to the provisions of the treaty, and all the burdens which are imposed upon her by its terms are now in actual process of execution. The League of Nations itself is already created; and from every expression of opinion, official or diplomatic, from the press, and from every other available source, we learn that there is no substantial objection anywhere in the world to American safeguarding reservations such as have already been adopted by a majority of the Senate.

Strange as it may seem, these reservations, whose provisions tend to safeguard the interests of the United States, are criticized and opposed solely in the very country whose independence of action in the future they seek to maintain and whose vital rights they protect.

The treaty of peace, with many additional annexes, comprises 440 articles. Of these 440 articles, the first 26 articles constitute the covenant of the League of Nations. The reservations do not affect in the least the first seven articles of the covenant, except in regard to the provision of withdrawal and in connection with inequality of representation, which has been discussed.

The eighth article of the league, which provides for a suggested plan of disarmament, is continued unchanged, except with reservation applicable only to an actual invasion of the United States or an actual state of war in which this country is engaged.

Article 9 is entirely unaffected.

Article 10, which I have discussed at some length, is safeguarded only so far as to make it clear that the people of this country, through their Representatives in Congress, must determine whether or not the United States will interfere or intervene in the quarrels or difficulties of foreign nations at the time when the question actually arises.

Article 11, of which the President said in his speech on the 4th of September as follows:

> I want to call your attention to article 11 of the covenant of the League of Nations. That article, let me say, is the favorite article in the league, so far as I am concerned.

This article is entirely unaffected by any reservation and remains precisely as it was presented to the Senate by the President.

Articles 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, which have to do with the general subject of arbitration and settlement of disputes, are left precisely as they were originally submitted by the President, except that the United States reserves to itself the right to determine domestic questions and the right to allow innocent citizens of foreign powers who happen to be resident in the United States and doing business here to continue their usual occupation.

Of these articles, 13 to 16 inclusive, of the covenant, the President said, in speaking in Indianapolis:

The heart of the league is that the nations solemnly covenant not to go to war for nine months after a controversy becomes acute.

This heart of the league is left, as I have indicated, without the slightest change.

Articles 17, 18, 19, and 20 are entirely unaffected by any of the reservations. They remain intact as they were originally written, and their provisions for settlement of disputes between members of the League of Nations and those who are not members of the league, and the provision for publicity of all treaties and international engagements and for the elimination of secrecy in regard to international understandings, are entirely unchanged.

Article 21, with its reference to "regional understandings, like the Monroe doctrine," is safeguarded, so far as the United States is concerned, in the manner which I have heretofore indicated.

Article 22, which has to do with mandatories over the former German colonies or territories, is unchanged, except for the provision requiring consent of the Congress of the United States before this country shall assume any such tutelary power.

Articles 24, 25, and 26, which conclude the covenant of the League of Nations and which provide for matters of procedure and for the encouragement of the Red Cross organization and for amendment, are entirely unchanged by any reservation.

So far as the treaty itself is concerned, exclusive of the League of Nations, there are only five reservations which in any real sense affect the treaty of peace. These five relate—

A. Reservation No. 6: To the Shantung provision.

B. Reservation No. 7: To our participation in reparation commissions or other committees and tribunals established by the treaty.

C. Reservation No. 8: To protection of American exports and imports in connection with Germany.

D. Reservation No. 12: Safeguarding the rights of citizens in connection with the settlement of debts and property rights and interests existing at the time of the war or incurred during the war.

E. Reservation No. 13: Which has to do with part 13 of the treaty relating to labor.

It may be said generally that every provision of the covenant of the League of Nations remains intact and capable of an entirely fair and efficient trial. What the reservations do provide is that when definite obligations are sought to be placed upon the United States, it is clearly provided in the reservations that before any such obligations can be either legally or morally binding upon this country they must be approved by the representatives of the American people in Congress at the time when the necessity arises.

It may be that the United States will of necessity be obliged to enter again in the settlement of European difficulties, but whether we do or not is not a question to be definitely determined at this time of uncertainty and doubt.

It would be folly intensified to bind the hands of our country to-day by obligations reaching out far in the future when no man can determine what the situation may be at the time we are called upon to fulfill these obligations. We have never yet failed to answer every call that rightly appealed to the judgment or conscience of the American people. In all the years to come let that call sound from whatever part of the globe it may, if it is right for the United States to respond, the response will be, as it always has been, immediate, sufficient, and effective. Whether or not we do respond in the future must depend entirely upon the will of the American people at the time. We are stronger both for ourselves and for the welfare of the world if we keep this Nation of ours so far as possible unentangled in international affairs—ready to act at any moment if the occasion appeals to the conscience of the American people, but entirely free from prior complicating and entangling agreements.

With every reservation—which, as I have said, I like to call and think of as American safeguarding reservations—inseparably interwoven in the ratification of the treaty itself, the covenant of the League of Nations still remains an instrument unhampered in its power to accomplish every purpose for which it was created, and with the interests of our own country thus protected it should be given a fair trial.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

As in legislative session,

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of Leighr A. Wright Post, No. 53, American Legion, of Hillsdale, Mich., praying for compulsory military training, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Leighr A. Wright Post, No. 53, American Legion, of Hillsdale, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a bonus for ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Federation of Labor, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the reduction of drop-letter postage from 2 cents to 1 cent, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 46, American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, of Port Huron, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Sterling-Graham sedition bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented memorials of sundry citizens of Elkhart and Ottawa, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Antelope Valley Post, No. 171, American Legion, of Palmdale, Calif., praying for the passage of the so-called Davey sedition bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Sampson Richards Post, No. 180, American Legion, of Maricopa, Calif., praying for the enactment of legislation providing a bonus for ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 194) amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 462) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) granting a bonus to enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts who have accepted or may accept their discharge in order to reenlist in said Philippine Scouts, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 463) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GAY:

A bill (S. 4018) for the relief of Joseph P. Groux; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4019) for the relief of certain estates; to the Committee on Claims.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It calls for certain information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 323) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director of the Council of National Defense is hereby directed to report to the Senate as soon as practicable:

First. A statement showing all the expenditures of the Committee on Public Information by principal classes, such as salaries; traveling; printing done at the Government Printing Office; printing done elsewhere than at the Government Printing Office; advertisements, photographs, and films; telephone, telegraph, and cable; office furniture; rents; and automobiles. In this statement set forth in detail the name, address, position, business, or occupation of each payee, together with an explanation of the purpose for which such expenditures were made. If the expenditures were for traveling, including subsistence, state fully the purpose of such traveling, whether the expenditure therefor included persons other than the payee; if so, the names and addresses of such person, together with a general statement as to the extent and purpose of the traveling.

Second. A statement of the unpaid accounts of the Committee on Public Information in the same form as the foregoing statement.

Third. A statement of the funds and property in the possession of the Committee on Public Information, its employees, agents, or representatives, and the location of the same at the time the Council of National Defense was placed in charge of its affairs.

Fourth. A statement of the funds and property recovered from various sources since the Director of the Council of National Defense began the auditing and closing of the accounts of said committee and the condition thereof.

Fifth. A statement of the records, files, and other property turned over to the Council of National Defense by the Committee on Public Information, and the condition thereof, showing also whether such records, files, and property included any of the records and files of the chairman of the Committee on Public Information, the editor of the Official United States Bulletin, the Service Bureau, and other divisions and bureaus of said committee, or any of the mailing lists of said committee, or whether the Director of the Council of National Defense and those employed by him have any information as to what was done with such lists, or any of them, or any other records, files, and property shown to have been in the possession of the Committee on Public Information but not turned over to the Council of National Defense or otherwise accounted for.

Sixth. All other pertinent facts in connection with the auditing and closing of the accounts and affairs of said committee.

Seventh. If the foregoing statements are not available at this time, a preliminary statement covering any or all of the data called for is directed to be transmitted in addition thereto.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12610. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AFFAIRS IN ARMENIA.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senate takes a recess, I desire to call its attention to the following telegram:

NEW YORK, March 4, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The American Committee for the Independence of Armenia received following official cablegram yesterday from Constantinople:

"French troops suddenly withdrew from Marash. Of the 4,500 Armenians who attempted to follow them, 3,000 were massacred and majority of remaining frozen. Also, 16,000 out of the 20,000 civilians remaining in the city have been massacred."

HENRY W. JESSUP,
Secretary, 1 Madison Avenue.

Mr. President, it would seem that those having charge of the treaty of peace with Turkey are sitting supinely by while the unspeakable Turks continue the atrocities which have characterized their course in the past, and are executing their purpose to destroy the Armenian people.

It is a pitiful thing to see an entire people destroyed by a cruel and merciless foe. It was thought that with the defeat of Germany and her allies that there would be no further persecution of the Armenian race. The view prevailed throughout the allied nations that Turkey would no longer be a terror to the Christian peoples of Europe or Asia, and that an independent nation would be erected by the remnants of the Armenian people, and that a day of peace and liberty would dawn for them. The centuries of sufferings and afflictions through which they have passed, it was believed, had ended, and ended forever, and that a new and regenerated Armenia would arise to take her place among the free peoples and nations of the earth.

More than a year has passed since the defeat of Turkey and the signing of the armistice. Yet during that period Armenia has been under the heel of the murderous Turks. Even now the innocent blood of thousands of men, women, and children is crimsoning the soil of Armenia, and the hands of the Ottoman Turks are red with the blood of the Armenian people.

What are the allied nations doing to prevent this martyrdom? What are the Christian nations doing to preserve a heroic and suffering people from destruction? The blood of millions of Armenians cries aloud for vengeance; the starving, afflicted, and terrorized people who survive piteously cry out for protection. We are deaf. Europe is deaf. The tragedy continues, and with tearless eyes we behold its consummation.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate, as in open executive session, take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, March 6, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 5, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, Thou hast taught us in Holy Writ and by experience, that life is a tangled web which each man must unravel for himself and weave into a fabric, fair to look upon, after the pattern set by the Master of all good workmen—a character which may be woven into the delicate tissues of the soul, well pleasing in Thy sight and in accordance with our own conscience; and we look forward to the day—

When only the Master shall praise us,
And only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money,
And no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working
And each, in his separate star,
Shall draw the thing as he sees it,
For the God of Things as they are!

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11756. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield, in Hampden County, Mass.; and

H. R. 12160. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point a little east of north of Nocona, in Montague County, Tex.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 156. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

CORRECTING ERROR IN INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 305, and I may say that it is only for the purpose of correcting an error in a date in the Indian appropriation bill that has already been signed by the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 305.

To amend a certain paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the fifth paragraph of section 18 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920, which reads as follows: "The sum of $200,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, in aid of the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations and the Quapaw Agency in Oklahoma, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be subject to the limitation in section 1 of the act of May 25, 1918 (40 Stat., p. 564), limiting the expenditure of money to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read:

"The sum of $200,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, in aid of the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations and the Quapaw Agency in Oklahoma, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be subject to the limitation in section 1 of the act of May 25, 1918 (40 Stat., p. 564), limiting the expenditure of money to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if he will be kind enough to tell in what respect this changes the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. There is an error in the date. The only change that is provided in this resolution is to change the date to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, whereas in the bill as it was passed it was June 30, 1920. That is the only change.

Mr. MADDEN. I see.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 0.

So the joint resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HASTINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

INCREASE OF FORCE AND SALARIES IN PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11984.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11984, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11984, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11984) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill H. R. 11984 is the committee substitute for three bills introduced early in this Congress by myself, as chairman of the Committee on Patents—H. R. 5011, 5012, and 7010. These bills were prepared by the patent committee of the National Research Council, consisting of a number of gentlemen connected with the arts, sciences, and industries of the country. They made an extensive investigation of the conditions in the Patent Office with regard to the Patent Office force and salaries. The Committee on Patents devoted considerable time during the month of July, 1919, to hearings on these bills, the hearings consisting of 320 pages. Appearing in favor of the measures was the patent committee of the National Research Council—I will not weary the House with the reading of the names, as you will find them in the report—the former Commissioner of Patents, Hon. Thomas Ewing; the present Commissioner of Patents, Hon. James T. Newton; a number of prominent inventors and scientists, as well as representatives of a large number of big manufacturers' associations of the country. The trouble in the Patent Office has been that during the war and since the signing of the armistice probably no other bureau of the Government has suffered from raids, or the taking away of its employees, both by other Government agencies and by the big industrial concerns of the country, as the Patent Office. The testimony that was presented to this committee was to the effect that the men would sooner retain their positions with the Government than go to outside institutions if there were any inducements in the way of salary or promotion. The statement was made and figures produced to show a large number of men, especially in the examining corps, had left the Patent Office during the war and since the signing of the armistice. The statement was made that at times we had as high as 80 temporary examiners on the roll. At the present time they have approximately 40 temporary examiners on the roll. It seems impossible to get the right caliber of men, or men with the necessary foundation in the way of technical education, to take the examination for examiners in the Patent Office or any of the other technical positions in that department. The committee gave careful consideration to the bills presented by the patent committee of the National Research Council, one of which was for the purpose of establishing a patent court of appeals. The subcommittee of the Patent Committee, headed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE], gave this measure careful consideration, and decided, after giving the matter all of the consideration that it needed, that no practical proposition had been set forth as to the way in which this patent court of appeals should be constituted, and for the time being the committee decided not to go ahead with that measure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the matter with the Patent Office force?

Mr. NOLAN. I just stated that the Patent Office force, especially the examining corps, have left the Patent Office to a greater degree than any other Government agency, due to the lack of opportunity in the way of promotion and the increased salaries and excellent opportunities offered to men of their technical knowledge on the outside, going with patent lawyers, going with the patent departments of the big industrial institutions of the country, going with engineering organizations and chemical organizations, as well as all kinds of positions where men of high technical training are needed. All industrial organizations in the country that have any considerable amount of patent business or business with the Patent Office have a patent department, and they have made a systematic raid on the Patent Office for their best men.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much do these examiners get now?

Mr. NOLAN. The primary examiners now get $2,700. It is proposed in this bill to raise them to $3,900. There are 45 primary examiners. And there are 90 first assistant examiners, whose salaries are fixed at $2,400. This bill proposes to grade them into four classes, starting at $2,900 and gradually increasing the salary to $3,300. Like provision is made for second, third, and fourth assistants, with a lower salary rating.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do these men get this celebrated bonus?

Mr. NOLAN. They do now—that is, anyone up to $2,500. Those that receive an excess of $2,500 can not, with the bonus added, receive in excess of $2,740. That is, providing Congress reestablishes the bonus.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you have the $480 bonus, it would raise it up a good deal.

Mr. NOLAN. Two hundred and forty dollars is the bonus, unless it can be raised to $480.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In trying to grab off the $480 bonus, you knocked off the $240 bonus.

Mr. NOLAN. It is a question whether we did or not. We had no opportunity to decide that question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do these private institutions pay larger wages than the Government?

Mr. NOLAN. I will give you what we have in reference to the experience of 60 examiners. There were 60 examiners who resigned from the Patent Office during the nine-month period running from May 1, 1919, to January 31, 1920—that is, the last nine months of last year. There were three principal examiners who resigned who were receiving $2,740. Two of them reported that they were receiving $4,500 in their new positions, two out of the three.

Twelve first assistant examiners resigned who were receiving $2,640. Seven of them reported that they were receiving an average salary of $3,670. It is proposed to raise their salaries to $3,300, which is less than they now receive in outside employment. The second assistant examiners, 22, were receiving $2,340, and their average salary in private employment is $3,011. Eighteen of them reported. It is proposed to give them $2,800. Fourteen third assistant examiners who resigned from the service received $2,040, and report that they are now receiving $2,818; that is, 10 of the 14. And it is proposed to give them $2,700. Of the fourth assistant examiners, a total of nine resigned. They were receiving an office salary of $1,740, and they are receiving on the outside an average salary of $2,230. It is proposed to give them $1,800. In the rearrangement of things, instead of having a fixed salary for these assistants, it is proposed in each one of these four grades to have a division, so that they can gradually receive promotion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, the Patent Office is the only part of the United States Government that brings in a net revenue?

Mr. NOLAN. The statement was made by the Patent Commissioner, both the present and the former, the Hon. Thomas Ewing, that the Patent Office up to date has produced a surplus to the Treasury of the United States in excess of $8,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Year by year it brings in a net revenue, does it not?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; a surplus. And it is proposed in this bill, I will state, Mr. Chairman, to so rearrange the fees—that is, the filing and final fees—so that additional revenue will be produced. In addition, the deficiency bill that became a law last November raised the price of copies of patents from 5 to 10 cents. This will produce an amount in excess of $156,000 additional revenue.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You are just fixing to absorb the surplus?

Mr. NOLAN. No, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri. And I want to impress this upon him, namely, that we are attempting in this bill to not alone increase the salaries, but increase the revenue, so that this measure will take care of any increases in salaries or increase of force.

Let me show you how it is being done. Prior to November 4, 1919, the cost of a copy of a patent was 5 cents. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in providing additional help for the Patent Office, called me into conference and took the propositions that were advanced during the hearings on this bill for raising the cost of copies from 5 to 10 cents for the purpose of producing additional revenue. Now, that deficiency bill raised the cost of copies from 5 to 10 cents. It was part of the program of the Patent Committee to raise this additional revenue, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations wanted to know if we had any objections to including it in that bill. There is in this bill a method of making the fellow that gets the work done on the patent pay for it when it is rejected.

In the present law the filing fee is $15 and the final fee is $20. Just about one-half of the patents applied for are granted, and most of the work is done on those patent applications which in the end are turned down. Let me give you some idea of that and the way it is going to increase the revenue. The gentleman from Missouri is of the opinion that this is a raid on the Patent Office for the purpose of absorbing the surplus. I want to show you that we are providing in this bill for additional revenue to take care of the increased force and increased compensation. The number of patent applications received in 1918 were 57,180. The final fees paid on that number were 38,006. Copies of the patents sold were 2,857,515. I want to call your attention to the increased work of the Patent Office after the war, which is a natural increase due to a stimulus in industry and manufactures.

During the year 1919 they received 76,484 applications for patents. The final fees, however, were paid on only 36,680. In other words, you collected the $20 for the final fee only on about 40 per cent of the applications. It is proposed in this bill to make the filing fee $20 and the final fee $15, so that the cost of a patent to the inventor has not been changed or increased, but the revenue to the Government has been increased, because at least 50 per cent of the patent applications are turned down.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But you make the poor devil who does not get his patent pay $5 extra for not getting it.

Mr. NOLAN. Whether he is a "poor devil" or not, the work is done on the application for patent, and ought to be paid for. It is easy enough for a man who has any sort of a patent or a chance of getting a patent to raise both the initial and final fee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I am concerned about is this: Is there concealed anywhere in this bill authority to anyone to grant a half patent, beyond what has been in the law for years past?

Mr. NOLAN. No. There is nothing of that kind in it, beyond the reclassifications here. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] will cover those sections of the bill, and I think they will convince the House that this is constructive legislation, with nothing concealed. In other words, it is a forward step to give the inventor something more than a lawsuit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I fought that half-patent proposition here for three months, and finally by a bare majority knocked it out. I hope they will not reinstate it.

Mr. NOLAN. I think you will not find it here.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman spoke of reclassifying these examiners and assistant examiners, so that although their salary will be less than is afforded to those who have resigned to enter private employment, they will have increased opportunities for increase by way of promotion. How will there be opportunity for promotion unless some of those at the top resign or leave the service?

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that there have always been resignations from the service. In fact the greater number of patent attorneys throughout the country and those in charge of the patent departments of great industrial combinations have at one time or another been employed in the Patent Office as examiners. I do not think we ought to stifle ambition by fixing high salaries and attempting to keep them there, but I think we ought at least to leave open some little loophole for a man to leave the service in a natural way, and let him get out of what is termed "the rut" of the Government service. In the original bill, you will notice, if you will run through it, the salaries were fixed considerably higher than they are fixed in this bill, and they were also fixed for these different grades at one particular stated amount. We graded them as well as cut them down. You will never lose the number of men you have been losing since the armistice. You will probably lose the average number that you always lost each year prior to the war. I do not think we should do anything to enter into competition with outside parties who can afford to pay more than the Government pays, but we should try to fix this thing in an equitable way.

Mr. WALSH. The point I was endeavoring to get information about was that these opportunities for promotion will come through a separation from the service, and not from the creation of a number of places at the top which are not now filled?

Mr. NOLAN. That is true. There will always be a certain percentage of those men, probably the best fitted men and the most ambitious men, who will leave the service, and it will give opportunity for promotion for the men down below to go up, and their opportunity will come when they come to the top where a man gets one of the chances outside.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. To what extent do the revenues of the Patent Office take care of the expenditures of this office?

Mr. NOLAN. As I said to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], up to the present time the revenues of the Patent Office have exceeded the disbursements by about $8,000,000. They ran a little behind during the year 1917, due to the low number of applications filed.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is, the revenues of the office or of the bureau paid for all the salaries and everything connected with the office, and you have that much in excess? Is that correct?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. The statement was made and not contradicted that there had been a surplus turned into the United States Treasury of about $8,000,000 in excess of expenditures.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, another question. On page 4, lines 10 and 11, of the bill, reference is made to the international bureau at Berne. What is that?

Mr. NOLAN. I will ask the gentleman to reserve that question until the gentleman who has that particular part of the bill in charge takes the floor.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And on page 5, line 18, as to the Official Gazette of the United States Patent Office, will the gentleman state briefly in what way that changes existing law?

Mr. NOLAN. I will say that I have got a rather hazy idea on that, and I would rather other gentlemen would speak of it.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. Some constituents of mine in my district have complained about the congested conditions in this department. One constituent had an application pending for over two years and died before he got it. Can the gentleman explain why this congested condition exists there? Is it because of this lack of trained examiners and employees, or what is it?

Mr. NOLAN. In recent years the most competent men in the Patent Office have resigned for lack of adequate salaries.

Mr. HARRELD. Do you remedy that in this bill?

Mr. NOLAN. We provide an inducement for men to enter the Patent Office and take these examinations for examiners, and there is a chance for promotion to the top. Under the present conditions they can not even get anybody to take the civil-service examination. That has resulted in the situation that the gentleman complains of. They have not had a sufficient permanent force to do the work of the office. They have not had enough employees in the Patent Office to do the work ordinarily, even if they were efficient.

Mr. HARRELD. Does not the gentleman think that is false economy? You say this is a self-supporting institution and pays a revenue. I think it would produce more revenue if better service were given.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. That is what we are trying to do with this bill. We have received every assistance, and the situation in Congress can readily be understood when it is stated that the Committee on Rules unanimously reported this rule making this bill in order.

Mr. HARRELD. I have had more complaints about the congestion in this department than in any other department of the Government.

Mr. BARBOUR. Would it inconvenience the gentleman if I referred to page 8?

Mr. NOLAN. Judge DAVIS will explain that when he takes the floor.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What amount does the committee estimate will be the revenue under this law in excess of what is now received under existing law?

Mr. NOLAN. Has the gentleman a copy of the report?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes; I have a copy of the report.

Mr. NOLAN. On page 4 of the report you will notice the following language:

> If the total expenditures should remain the same for the year ending December 31, 1920, and the receipts be increased as shown by the above table, the net surplus over all expenditures for the calendar year ending December 31, 1920, should be $721,650.45. If the force and salaries be increased as supposed by the bill, it would amount to $511,840, so that the net surplus would be $209,810.45.
> The increase of receipts for the year 1919 over the year 1918 was $438,367.45. The increase due to doubling the cost of copies was $156,432.35. That shows even in the latter part of the year the increase in the cost of copies would, if it had extended over the entire period, have increased the revenue $156,432.35. The increase due to the raising of the filing fee from $15 to $20, leaving the final fee at $20, would amount to $382,420.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I think I catch the point; the increase from the fees under the record made for the year 1919——

Mr. NOLAN. And the increase of the cost of copies.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Would be $156,000, in round numbers.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. I want to say to the gentleman that we have also to take into consideration the tremendous increase of the business of the Patent Office that is a great revenue producer.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes; does the gentleman have the information as to how many resigned for the year prior to the time covered by the report which he has made?

Mr. NOLAN. It is contained in the hearings year by year, and shows the comparison. I can not give it offhand now, but about three times as many, I think.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Twenty as against sixty.

Mr. NOLAN. That was for six months.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Certainly.

Mr. ELSTON. In regard to the provisions of the bill as to the increase of compensation, did the committee have the assistance of experts in the matter of drafting the bill?

Mr. NOLAN. The bill was originally drafted by the patent committee of the National Research Council, and they had the assistance of the best patent lawyers in the country—Frederick P. Fish, of Boston, and the secretary of the patent committee of the National Research Council, E. J. Prindle, and Thomas Ewing, the former Commissioner of Patents—as well as a large number of eminent men prominent in the arts, sciences, and industries of the country.

Mr. ELSTON. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. NOLAN. Nearly all the patent attorneys in the country had an opportunity to go over the bill and offer suggestions. The gentleman from Tennessee, who was responsible for the draft of the damage clause, will state how much thought and consideration was given to that.

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman feel that the representatives of the council and all interested that might be affected by the patent law have been represented and given their approval of the bill?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not think there is a branch of industry—there was not a society concerned with invention, art, science, chemistry, engineering, that was not represented at the hearings last July and the hearings that took place a week ago Tuesday before the Rules Committee. The chairman of the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], made the statement there that it was the most representative gathering that had appeared before the Rules Committee during the 10 years in which he had been a member.

Mr. ELSTON. Was there any particular opposition brought out at the hearings?

Mr. NOLAN. Not after the committee's bill had been drafted. There was some opposition to some of the provisions in the original bill, but the committee gave careful consideration to the criticisms, and when the bill was finally reported there was very little opposition.

Mr. ELSTON. Has the gentleman made any estimate as to how far this bill would expedite the business of the Patent Office, clearing up congestion and finishing up the work in that office?

Mr. NOLAN. The Commissioner of Patents and all those who have had any considerable amount of business or experience with the Patent Office are of the opinion that this is a step forward in the right direction. It may not meet all of the difficulties there, but it is a step in the right direction and they feel with the provisions of this measure and the increase of salary, the opportunity for promotion, will tend to greatly increase the efficiency of the Patent Office and get away from the terrible congestion and result in sending out of that office more valid patents and less invalid patents than we have at the present time with the force there, the best we could get under the present conditions. We are opening up a way for young men of the right sort to enter the Patent Office and become competent men for examiners in the Patent Office.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. I notice that the net increase of salaries is $511,840.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. The chairman of the committee states that that does not mean anything, because the people will be charged an additional fee and you take it out of the people.

Mr. NOLAN. I do not know that I said exactly that. I said that in drafting this bill the committee had in mind the present state of the Treasury, the need of economy, and we did not want to materially increase the expenses of the Patent Office without in some way producing the revenue necessary to meet them. It is accomplished in three ways. Under the present law the filing fee is $15 and the final fee $20. The gentleman will find on page 4 of the report, at the top of the page, that the applications for inventions during 1919 amounted to 76,484, an increase over the applications in 1918 of 19,304. During the year 1919, out of the 76,484, 36,680 patents were finally granted. That means that about 40,000 were never adjudicated. Under the new system we will receive the additional $5 on the 40,000, or over $200,000 additional, due to the changing of the law. In addition to that it is estimated, and undoubtedly it will prove to be so, that there will be just as great a demand for copies of patents in 1920 as in 1919. In fact, the office is months behind, and is behind in hundreds of thousands of applications for copies. We have increased the cost of the copies from 5 cents to 10 cents in the deficiency bill, and that will produce considerably over $200,000. Even on the estimate of 1919 it will produce $156,000. The third proposition is the tremendous increase in the business of the Patent Office, which will greatly increase the revenue.

Mr. SEARS. Take 1919. There was a wonderful increase in business, amounting to $438,367 over that of 1918. I am simply asking these questions because I have listened to so many speeches on economy.

Mr. NOLAN. We are using that as an illustration of what we are trying to do to increase the revenue. If we were not increasing it a penny, the situation in the Patent Office is so important to industry in this country that we ought to immediately correct it. This is one office that needs the highest type of skilled technical men.

Mr. SEARS. They are not all skilled, technical men. Of course, the gentleman understands that.

Mr. NOLAN. I would say to the gentleman from Florida that all of the examiners——

Mr. SEARS. Oh, yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Both in the trade-mark and patent divisions are skilled men and must necessarily be.

Mr. SEARS. I agree to that; but they are not all skilled men in the Patent Office. The messengers are not.

Mr. NOLAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Florida that we have included in this bill the principle of the minimum wage bill. Let me say something about the messengers. There has been a hue and cry about messengers. The fact of the matter is that in the Patent Office they have three messengers.

Mr. SEARS. And 33 assistants.

Mr. NOLAN. And we asked the commissioner why they wanted 33 assistants and 3 messengers. He said that those men outside of three are doing clerical work and not doing messenger work.

Mr. SEARS. I would like to go down with the gentleman and have him show me the messengers who are doing clerical work.

Mr. NOLAN. If he will go to the Patent Office the gentleman would see a different situation from what he sees in other departments, where there are a lot of door openers.

Mr. SEARS. I notice that the increase will amount to $1,994,740. That does not include the bonus?

Mr. NOLAN. No; we are fixing the basic salaries.

Mr. SEARS. So that it would go much over two millions of dollars with the bonus.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; but the $240 is being paid now, and they are basing the estimate of cost on that proposition.

Mr. SEARS. I am trying to get at the net—whether there would be an increase or a deficiency. The report does not include that.

Mr. NOLAN. With the opportunities for increased revenue in this bill there would be an increased surplus in that office; and if there was not, it is the duty of this House and the duty of Congress to take care of the deplorable situation that has existed in the Patent Office for the past three or four years. You can not get men to stay there. I have received a number of letters, and they are not inspired, and the gentleman's colleague, Mr. DRANE, submitted several to me for inventors, men interested in industry in the State of Florida. It is not a question of only 1 State; it is 48 States. We have to do something if we want to stop the granting of patents by the Patent Office that merely means more lawsuits. That is exactly the situation. It has been bad enough under our patent laws at any time. A man generally got a certificate which on the face of it said he had a monopoly for 17 years upon some article of utility, and the net result in many cases, if he interfered with some one else, especially in the big world of industry, was that he found himself with a certificate that entitled him to go into court. We are going to try to get the kind of men who will give careful search to these things, who will go into the Patent Office and stay there long enough to make up a good organization, so that this sort of thing will stop.

Mr. SEARS. I was surprised to find that they were so far behind, because I would say this for the Patent Office: I never found a department in Washington so prompt or efficient whenever I had any correspondence with them.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 40 minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this proposed legislation grew out of the fact that there were very general complaints from business interests and inventors to the effect that they were unable to procure speedy and efficient service in the Patent Office. Finally, with the consent of the Commissioner of Patents at that time, Mr. Thomas Ewing, and with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, a request was made of the National Research Council to investigate the conditions in the Patent Office and make recommendations looking to remedying the unsatisfactory situation.

This National Research Council is composed of eminent scientists, patent attorneys, and others, who have no selfish interest, no ax to grind, in regard to the Patent Office. They appointed a subcommittee composed of three very eminent patent attorneys, Mr. Thomas Ewing, who at one time was, as I have said, Commissioner of Patents; Mr. Frederick P. Fish, of Boston, who is an eminent patent attorney, and who is sometimes called the dean of the American patent bar; and Mr. Edwin J. Prindle, together with some scientists. They conducted an exhaustive investigation, and made a report in which they made four specific recommendations. Two of their recommendations were embodied in separate bills, which are not now before the Congress and which may not be reported. However, two recommendations which they made are embodied in the bill under consideration, to wit, the recommendation of an increase in the force of the Patent Office and also an increase in their salaries, and the recommendation that provision be made for greater ease and certainty in obtaining money compensation for the infringement of a valid patent. This subcommittee prepared and submitted to the Patent Committee bills embodying their recommendations. Those bills were introduced. The Committee on Patents conducted extensive hearings, and heard not only those who had manifested an interest in this legislation, but all others who indicated a desire to be heard. There was practical unanimity on the part of these various witnesses in approving this proposed legislation. After these hearings the Committee on Patents unanimously reported out and recommended for passage the bill now under consideration. After hearings on the bill and a request for a special rule, the Rules Committee unanimously adopted a rule for its immediate consideration.

The chairman of our committee has already made a lucid explanation of the bill as to certain features, and particularly the increase in force and salaries of the Patent Office. I only wish to deal with that feature of it very briefly. In the first place, I want to state that I am very much in favor of economy, and I think that my position upon various measures during the short time I have been a Member of the House will bear testimony to that fact, but there is such a thing as false economy, and a continuation of the conditions now existing in the Patent Office would be false economy not only for the Government but also the industrial interests of the Nation. I am not one of those who subscribe to the doctrine that our Government is run in the interest of the officeholders. I think that the officeholders are incidental, and that they should not be paid salaries merely as a favor to them, but I do think that this Government ought to pay salaries that will reasonably compensate its employees, and which will also result in procuring efficient service. Any other course is far from being economical. There is a different situation in the Patent Office from that which obtains in any other department of this Government. The salaries of the employees of the Patent Office have only been increased 10 per cent since 1848. Think of it! Only 10 per cent increase since 1848, when their salaries were originally fixed. At that time Congress considered these examiners to be of such a character and of such importance that their salaries were fixed at just about what the salaries of Congressmen were at that time. These examiners are required to have practically a university education. They are then required to undergo a very rigid civil-service examination.

Then they do not really become very efficient until they have served their apprenticeship in this work, and the result has been that after a few years there, and when they have reached the point where they are rendering real efficient service to the Government and to the various interests involved, private interests come along and offer them larger salaries than they are now receiving and they are taken from the Patent Office. They have been drawn from the Patent Office in large and increasing numbers. It is getting worse and worse all the time as the cost of living advances. This situation operates in two ways. In the first place, it makes it impossible to retain a full corps of employees all the time, and, in the second place, it deprives the Government of the services of employees when they become efficient. The result of this lack of a sufficient number of employees and lack of compensation, which would warrant them in continuing in the service, has brought about a condition which has produced complaints from one end of this country to the other. Manufacturing enterprises, inventors, patent attorneys, and other people who have an interest in inventions have been making complaints, particularly to the Committee on Patents. The National Research Council reported, in substance, that the whole trouble was the failure on the part of Congress to enact appropriate and needed legislation, and in no part of their investigation or report does this council criticize the Patent Office or any of the employees thereof. They commend them and state, in substance, that they have done remarkably well under the circumstances, and they attribute the trouble solely to the reasons stated. They report that the conditions in the Patent Office about which complaint is so frequently made are due to the fact that the force in the Patent Office is insufficient and underpaid. As has already been explained by the chairman, it is estimated that this increase in salaries will be more than made up by the increase in the business which will be dispatched, because the Patent Office is far behind in its work, and this will enable them to render the service which the inventors are demanding, to which they are entitled and for which they stand ready and willing to pay, together with the small increases made in the fees. The Patent Office has always been more than self-sustaining, and, in fact, the receipts of the office have exceeded the disbursements by about $8,000,000, so that this legislation will not result ultimately in any appropriation out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman be willing at this point in his remarks to consider the provision on page 8 relative to the fixing of damages in cases of infringement?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] that I had concluded all I care to say with regard to the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and shall devote the balance of my time to a discussion of the legal aspects of this bill, including the one referred to.

Mr. BARBOUR. I notice that it is provided on page 8 that if the exact determination and calculation of the amount of the damage can not be arrived at by the court, then the court shall receive expert testimony as to what the damage may be. Now, as I understand it—and I base my statement upon experience—it is practically impossible to arrive at an exact calculation and determination of damages in any case of this kind. Furthermore, it is rather unusual to base damages solely upon expert testimony. Would it not be possible in cases of this kind to require the person who is charged with infringing the patent and against whom the judgment might be rendered to submit his books or accounts in order to determine what his profits might be and the amount of the damage?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will state in reply to the gentleman that the policy suggested would not meet the situation which this amendment is intended to meet; and if the gentleman will just wait until I reach that in logical sequence, I will undertake to explain the matter fully.

Gentlemen of the committee, beginning on page 4 of the bill, you will note that sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 change the existing statutes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman, in that connection, explain the item just before section 3, relating to the international bureau? What is that?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That is simply a bureau maintained at Berne, Switzerland, for the convenience of all patentees. In other words, it directly aids the American inventors and those of all other countries who become members of this international bureau in obtaining the protection for their inventions and patents in European countries.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is, if an American inventor takes out a patent here and wants to take it out in other countries, he takes it out through the Berne office?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; he takes it out through this international bureau at Berne, and by filing it there——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. By taking it out there he automatically obtains protection in all of those European countries that are members of this international bureau. It is a very beneficial provision.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And all the countries that are members of this bureau contribute to the maintenance of the bureau the same as the United States?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes. This simply provides for the contribution of our pro rata part, and there is no change of existing law in that respect. This provision is already the law.

Now, the most of these sections comprise only minor changes in the existing law upon the subject and I shall not take up the time of the committee in explaining any of those changes unless some Member desires.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does section 4 change existing law in any respect; and if so, in what way?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Well, that is simply an amplification and a more detailed provision with regard to the admission of patent attorneys and their exclusion for misconduct.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Section 3 refers to the Official Gazette, on page 5, line 5, beginning with line 18.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The only change in existing law made by that section occurs on page 6, line 3, where the word "weekly" is inserted so as to provide for weekly as well as monthly and annual indexes.

Now, coming to the change embodied in section 7, beginning on line 7, after the word "direction," the bill as originally drafted by this subcommittee of the National Research Council employed this language:

If proof is not offered, or in the absence of adequate proof of the amount that shall be awarded as damages or profits, the court, on due proceedings had, may adjudge and decree to the owner payment of a reasonable royalty or other form of general damages.

The members of the Committee on Patents did not think that that was in the proper phraseology, and, if you will pardon a personal reference, the committee requested me to draft what I thought would meet the views of the committee in that regard. Realizing the importance of the subject, I took the matter up with Messrs. Edwin J. Prindle, Frederick P. Fish, and Thomas Ewing, the three patent lawyers on the subcommittee of the National Research Council, which had originally drafted this bill, and who had manifested so much interest in it. In addition to that, at the suggestion of Mr. Prindle, who took the lead before our committee in presenting these matters for the National Research Council, I likewise submitted my draft to Judge Julius M. Thayer and Judge Learned Hand and also to Judge Martin I. Manton, three members of the Federal judiciary, who had had very considerable experience in patent litigation. I likewise submitted same to Mr. Milton Tibbets, chairman of the patents committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, and others. After full discussion and some minor changes, the committee amendment as reported was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The amendment, which you will find in italics on page 8, meets the approval of all these learned and expert men to whom the provision was submitted.

Mr. Prindle, the authorized representative of the National Research Council before our committee, in his last communication upon the subject, approved the committee amendment in the following letter:

NEW YORK, February 27, 1920.

Hon. EDWIN L. DAVIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE DAVIS: I wish to say that I think your wording of the amendment to the patent statute providing for the awarding of general damages for infringement of patents is much better than that which was in our original bill. The amendment does not go as far as I would like to have it, as you know, but it probably goes as far as can be enacted. I therefore wish to express my appreciation of what you have done in the matter, and the hope that your wording of the amendment will go through, as there is apparently no doubt it will.

Yours, sincerely,

EDWIN J. PRINDLE.

This proposed amendment reads as follows:

If on the proofs it shall appear that the complainant has suffered damage from the infringement or that the defendant has realized profits therefrom to which the complainant is justly entitled, but that such damages and profits are not susceptible of exact calculation and determination, the court may, on evidence tending to establish the same, in its discretion receive opinion or expert testimony, which is hereby declared to be competent and admissible, subject to the general rules of evidence applicable to this character of testimony; and upon such evidence the court may adjudge and decree the payment by the defendant to the complainant of a reasonable sum as a royalty or general damages for the infringement.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is it not an unusual thing, in arriving at damages in any case, to determine the amount of the damages by expert testimony as to the amount thereof?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That is true. But I want to explain to the gentleman from California and the members of the committee the reason which prompted the desire for this sort of a provision.

To state a specific case, which I think was stated by one of the witnesses: An inventor takes out a patent upon a certain feature of a piano. It is patented and some manufacturer infringes upon that patent; in other words, uses this patent upon his pianos and proceeds with the sale of his pianos. Now, as a matter of course, it is impossible to ascertain with any exact calculation just how much that one piece of the piano bears toward the selling price or the profits made by the manufacturer upon that entire piano. Unless some such provision as this is adopted, although he has a good right of action—although he shows that there has been an infringement upon a valid patent of his—yet the owner of the infringed patent can not recover actual damages or profits for the reason that there is no way of definitely determining what proportion the value or profit of his patent bears toward the entire article.

Mr. BARBOUR. Right there, if the gentleman will yield further. Would any expert, no matter how well qualified, be able to testify with any degree of definiteness as to what the damage in a case of that kind might be?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No. It is as impossible to estimate or give an exact opinion as to same as it is impossible in personal injury cases to estimate the actual damages resulting from a death or the loss of an arm or of a foot.

Mr. BARBOUR. Absolutely.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. But should litigants be deprived of their rights because they are not susceptible of exact mathematical calculation?

Mr. BARBOUR. Not by any means; but it seems to me that the language which was originally incorporated in the bill and then stricken out, from line 7 to line 11, which permits the judge to fix or decree a reasonable royalty or other form of general damages, is really to be preferred to the committee amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. In the absence of any proof?

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, there must be proof.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The provision for which the committee amendment is offered to be substituted reads, "if proof is not offered, or in the absence of adequate proof."

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; adequate proof. I would not consider that expert testimony as to the amount of damages sustained in the case suggested, and as the gentleman just described, would be adequate proof. Therefore I would rather leave the amount of damages to be fixed by the judge, to be based on whatever proof is properly submitted to him, than to let some expert come into court and testify as to the amount of damages.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I thank the chairman for the additional time.

Replying to the last observation by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], I wish to state that the proposed committee amendment expressly provides that the amount of recovery shall be fixed and decreed by the court—not by the expert witnesses—but it provides that such decree shall be based upon proof. It does not change the existing measure of damages or procedure other than to provide that in the instance specifically described the court may receive and consider expert testimony in arriving at the proper amount of damages or profits to be decreed. In order that such evidence shall not be accorded more weight than is accorded same in other proceedings, this proposed amendment expressly provides that such testimony shall be "subject to the general rules of evidence applicable to this character of testimony."

The trouble is that there has been a long line of decisions holding that unless a patentee can show exactly how much profits or damages he is entitled to because of an infringement upon his patent, he can not recover anything. Of late years some of the courts have recognized the injustice of this and have shown a tendency to afford relief. However, there is always a strong disinclination on the part of the judiciary to depart from well-established legal principles. This question was considered and discussed by the United States Supreme Court in the case of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. v. Wagner Electric & Manufacturing Co. (225 U. S., 604, decided June 7, 1912). In that case the court held that where the infringer has sold or used a single or specific patented article the patentee is entitled to recover all of the profits, and that the same rule obtains where it is shown that the patent represents all of the value or profits of the article sold. However, the court further held, as stated in the syllabi, as follows:

Where the patent admittedly creates only a part of the profits, the patentee is only entitled to that part, and he must apportion the infringer's profits and show by reliable and satisfactory evidence either what part of the profits are attributable to his patent or that the entire value of the infringing article is attributable to his patent. (Garretson v. Clark, 111 U. S., 120.)

Congress has legislated, Revised Statutes, 4921, with a view to affording the patentee ample redress against the infringer, but the general rule of law that the burden is on the one suing for profits to show that they had been made applies.

The patent itself is evidence of the utility of the claim, and an infringer is estopped from denying that it is of value.

Where the plaintiff patentee shows that profits have been made by the use of his patent, but defendant proves that there were other elements contributing to the profits, it then devolves upon the plaintiff to apportion the amount of profits attributable to the use of his patent.

In other words, the Supreme Court recognized the validity of the rights of the patentee, but also recognized the situation in which he was placed. The court modified the rules stated to the extent that where the infringer, by commingling the elements, renders it impossible for the patentee to meet the requirement of apportionment the entire inseparable profit must be given to the patentee, the burden shifting to the defendant in such instance.

In the case of the United States Frumentum Co. against Lauhoff et al., 216 Federal Reporter, page 610, the court, as stated in the syllabus, held as follows:

In a case where willful infringement is shown, with sales of the patented product by defendant so extensive as to leave no doubt that complainant sustained substantial damages, he will not be denied relief because of his inability to prove an established royalty or to make definite proof of sales lost, but general evidence to prove his damages or a reasonable royalty may be considered, as in other cases of tort, and from that a finding may be made as to what would be fair compensation for his injury.

"General damages" are damages not resting on any of the applicable, exact methods of computation, but upon facts and circumstances which permit the jury or the court to estimate in a general but in a sufficiently accurate way the injury to plaintiff.

The court uses the exact words which the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] has criticized. As just shown, some of the courts have liberalized their decisions in an effort to recognize and remedy the situation which this amendment is intended to remedy. But there is a wide variety of decisions, and there is uncertainty and indefiniteness, and this provision is simply intended to crystallize into statute law a proper rule of guidance for all the courts of the country in such cases. It has the approval of the patent lawyers and the manufacturers and inventors and the people interested; and the committee and others who have studied the question, with perhaps very few exceptions, feel that this amendment will meet the situation and will result in the awarding of profits or damages to which the owners of patents are clearly entitled in case of infringement, but of which they have heretofore been deprived because of the unfortunate situation in which they were placed and their inability to calculate with any exactness the damages which they sustained or the royalties which the infringer had made. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, the Philadelphia Public Ledger, under date of February 29, prints the speech of a prominent gentleman from Tennessee, acting in a representative capacity in the legislative body at the other end of the Capitol, in which he is quoted as asking if the benefits of the League of Nations are to be thrown away "because they affect a few 'dagoes' on the Adriatic coast."

I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the verbiage of this statement has been changed to remove the slur which was cast on a nation, and a nation's people, which did her great part to insure victory for us and our other European allies in the World War.

To refer to these great people as "dagoes" not only should be resented by the Americans of Italian descent in this country but should be resented by every thinking American who has associated with these peace-loving, God-fearing people.

On this question I feel I am able to talk with intimate knowledge. In Philadelphia I am constantly in close association with the Italian people, and many of them are learned in law, medicine, art, finance, and general business. In addition to that association I have been in close touch with those who have employed them in business for more than a quarter century. They are one of the greatest forces of production we have in this country. Since the first great influx of Italian immigrants to our shores I have seen them speedily acquire American ideals and American citizenship. I have found them to be citizens of the highest order and law-abiding in every respect.

As Americans they are loyal. They demonstrated this in the Great War, when the country called to every able-bodied man to respond to the draft. Those who had acquired citizenship responded without question, and in no case brought to my attention did an Italian who had not acquired citizenship claim exemption because of his foreign nationality. In the district I represent there are large numbers of these fine, patriotic people.

When Russia deserted the cause of the Allies it was the Italian Army, and the Italian Army alone, which prevented the full Austrian forces from being thrown against the American, English, and French troops on the western front. Stunned by numerous reverses, the Italians at the crucial moment engaged the enemy and under the leadership of Gen. Diaz regained all the territory they had lost and chased the foe across the low Venetian plains, over mountains, and through mountain passes from the Piave far into the enemy's territory.

I can remember the celebration held in Philadelphia and here in Washington at that time. It was a glorious victory, and did much to strengthen the morale of the other Allies. I can remember the acclaim of the American press on this accomplishment.

Is there one man in this House who did not cheer our friend and former colleague, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, when he returned from the Italian front? He was a courageous young man. He only typified the spirit of his kinsfolk in what he did, however.

I would like to more emphatically express my disapproval of the utterance of the gentleman in question if the rules of the House would permit; but, to say the least, it is to be regretted that any man acting in a representative capacity in the United States would so far forget himself as to use language causing insult to any great people. When we consider that men of all nationalities, birth, and color stood side by side in the trenches fighting for the liberty of the world, it seems to me that prejudices of all kinds might well be cast aside, for after all we are all Americans, striving for the good of our country.

I wish to read a telegram I have received from C. C. A. Baldi, of Philadelphia, head of the Italian Federation, which demonstrates the grief and remorse these people feel as a result of the unwarranted attack upon them and theirs on the floor of the legislative chambers of this Government. It is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., March 3, 1920.

Hon. W. S. VARE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The membership of the Italian Federation, for themselves and in behalf of thousands of Italians of Philadelphia who were companions in arms with the American doughboys, resent the reference of the gentleman from Tennessee to Italians as "Dagoes." We earnestly ask that you protest against his discourtesy and place your protest in the RECORD in answer to this un-American utterance.

C. C. A. BALDI.
President Italian Federation.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL] yield me some time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. I want to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 10 minutes. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] has 10 minutes of his own left.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the somewhat unusual origin of this bill, in that the request for a reorganization and adjustment of the salaries in the Patent Office does not primarily originate with the employees themselves. This demand originates from the great manufacturing industries and other industries of this country. I think that any one who attended the meeting of the Committee on Rules, as I did, would have been impressed, as the Committee on Rules was impressed, by the widely representative character of those who appeared before it.

In the report of the Committee on Patents it will be found that gentlemen who have assisted in this legislation were representatives of the great electrical industry, the rubber industry, the inventor of the gyroscope and other inventions, which have made possible the great work of the Navy; representatives of wireless telegraphy, of the trolley; representatives of Mr. Edison who has contributed to the whole world inventions without which modern civilization would not be what it is; in addition to which there were representatives of the automobile industry which has revolutionized life, particularly country life. Although it is a commonplace it is not without interest for Members to recall to their minds some of the great basic industries of this country and of the whole world which are dependent upon inventions that have gone through the United States Patent Office. Speaking offhand and without investigation, perhaps the first in point of time and possibly in importance was the cotton gin; then the patent on which the whole rubber industry of the United States is founded; then steamships, telegraphs, telephones, agricultural machinery without which the farms of this country could not now be conducted; the typewriter and calculating machines, which have revolutionized the work in offices and banks; all the patents relating to electric-generating machinery, to patents on shoe machinery, without which the people of the world could not be shod; all the branches of the chemical industry. And when you come to war, America, although a Nation of peace, has really led in inventions in that direction. It was through the Patent Office of this country that the first repeating pistol, the Colt revolver, was patented, and during the Civil War the first repeating rifle. I need not go further in enumerating the endless list. It is worth while occasionally to remember what everyone, whether he is engaged in mechanical industry or not, owes to inventors and to the patent system of this country, which I believe was really the parent of the great patent systems of the world, and which in many respects leads them to-day.

One of the fundamental ideas in our patent system is that when a man gets a patent he shall have at least a prima facie case in favor of the proposition that he has a new and useful invention. That is different from the patent laws of some other countries. It means that an invention must be examined in the Patent Office, both with reference to whether it is a practical invention in itself and also whether somebody else has invented something similar before. It is perfectly evident that that means that the examiners must not only be able men, well trained in mechanics, but they must have experience and knowledge of the arts. They must know by investigation of drawings, books, or other historical records whether somebody else has invented the same thing before, so as to determine whether a man who now applies is entitled to a patent. It is on that point that this bill really centers, for when a man has been in the Patent Office only two or three months he is almost useless, because he must work so slowly. Every month of his service makes him more valuable, as he grows in knowledge of devices and patents relating to the classes he examines. As the chairman of the committee has said, we can not offer sufficient salaries to hold men there indefinitely, because when a man gets to be noted as an expert in the Patent Office he is sure to be taken out, either to go into private practice or into the employ of some great manufacturing concern.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MERRITT. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. That being the case, if service in the Patent Office for a while places him in the position of being an expert, commanding a big salary from private institutions, ought not the prospective employee to pay the Government a bonus to allow him to get in there, in order that he may be eligible for these big private salaries afterwards?

Mr. MERRITT. No.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. GARD. On the contrary, is it not to the credit of the men who are employed there that they perfect themselves and so are able to obtain outside employment?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. Also I will say in reply to the gentleman from Texas that we ought to pay these men enough so that we can hold them for a while after they become expert and useful. The object of this bill is to make it possible to hold men at least until they are largely perfected. As it is now, with the very small salaries paid, the tendency is to get out before they are half trained, and consequently the office has no fully trained men. I heard the Commissioner of Patents state that with the force they now have it takes nearly three times as long as it used to take to do the same amount of work.

I want to call the attention of the committee to just what that means to the inventors. That is the reason why inventors and manufacturers are so anxious for this legislation. Nothing is so expensive to them as delay and inaccuracy in the examination of their inventions. I myself have had some little experience as a manufacturer. When an inventor comes to a manufacturer with a patent, he looks it over and says, "I think that is a fine thing. I will take it, and we will agree on the royalty which I shall pay for the manufacture of your article; but, of course, I can not actually sign a contract until I know that the invention is new." The only way the inventor can find that out is by having the application put into the Patent Office and see what sort of a patent the inventor gets. Therefore they make what is called an "if and when" contract, which means that if you get a patent and when you get a patent then certain things shall be done. Now, it is evident that it makes a great deal of difference to that man whether he can get his patent through in 60 days or whether he has got to wait a year or a year and a half. The testimony is that now in some classes it is eight or nine months before they begin to examine the application.

What we are doing in this bill is this: We are not asking the people of the United States to appropriate more money. We are simply taking the inventors at their word. They as a class come to us and say that the most expensive thing they can have is poor service in the Patent Office. They say, "We want you to arrange it so as to give us good service, and we will pay the extra money. It is a bagatelle whether we pay $5 or $10 more for a patent which when obtained may be worth $5,000 or $100,000, or whatever it may be."

Mr. NOLAN. The fact is that we are simply reversing the filing fee and the final fee, and the total cost of obtaining the patent is no more.

Mr. MERRITT. That is correct. I am glad the gentleman called attention to that. The final cost of a patent under this bill is no more. It simply transfers $5 from the final fee to the initial fee, and the fact of the matter is that absolutely all the work is done before the final fee is paid, so that it is an entirely just provision. I think if the House will bear in mind the fundamental basis of this bill, which is that inventors and manufacturers are simply asking for better service in their interest and for the economy and efficiency of the whole business structure of the United States, they will not hesitate to support this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, because on Wednesday I made a point of order against the provision in the legislative appropriation bill granting a bonus of $240 during the next fiscal year to our 200,000 civilian Government employees the Post denominates me as "the enemy of organized labor." These civilian employees of the Government first received a war bonus of $120, and then a war bonus of $240, and for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, they are still drawing a bonus of $240, and although the war is over they not only want to continue drawing this war bonus of $240 during 1921 but they are demanding of Congress that it be raised to $480, and when I made the point of order it prevented raising this bonus to $480.

The Chair sustained my point of order and struck this bonus provision from the bill. If it had not been an unauthorized provision, he would not have sustained me.

I deny that I am an enemy of organized labor. I am an enemy of radical union leaders who would ruin legitimate labor organizations to carry out their own selfish ends, and I have fought their unlawful plans, the selfish, unreasonable demands, acts, and purposes. I am a truer friend to honest, law-abiding laborers, organized and unorganized, than their radical leaders who have been exploiting laborers out of millions of dollars for years.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman speak louder, so that we can hear him?

Mr. BLANTON. Let the gentleman from New York come down in front.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I can talk low or loud, as I please.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Texas is in order, and he will proceed.

Mr. BLANTON. To the brave soldiers, sailors, and marines who won a world war and faced the hell of "No man's land" this Congress has paid them a measly, miserly, insignificent little bonus of $60—not enough to buy a good suit of civilian clothes. These battle-scarred soldiers faced death while being paid only $33 per month, while our maximum war-time force of 240,000 civilian employees, who drew first a bonus of $120 and then a bonus of $240, drew maximum compensation from this Government as high as $2,740 per annum while working only seven hours per day in safe, comfortable, enjoyable surroundings.

When making this point of order I stated that I would stand for this injustice no longer; that these civilian employees of the Government were "hoggish" in now demanding $480 bonus when the war is over, and that I would not vote to give them another bonus until justice had been done the worthy, needy soldiers who made the United States safe for these organized civilians.

UNREASONABLE HOGGISHNESS.

From the editorial page, page 4, of the Federal Employee, the Government workers' magazine and the official organ of the National Federation of Federal Employees, issue of February 28, 1920, I quote the following:

As we go to press the House of Representatives is considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and is expected to reach section 6, which contains the salary-bonus provisions, very soon. As reported by the Committee on Appropriations, the bonus remains as during the present fiscal year. Our national federation, with the active assistance of the locals, is making every effort to induce members of the House to support the temporary salary-increase schedule approved by our San Francisco convention—$480 for those receiving up to and including $2,500; $360 for those receiving between $2,500 and $3,500; and $240 to those whose salaries run from $3,500 to and including $4,500.

The above comes from the Government employees themselves through their official mouthpiece, the Federal Employee.

Digest the above schedule. This is what Government employees demand:

To civilian employees, $480 bonus to the $2,500 clerks, $360 bonus to the $3,500 clerks, $240 bonus to the $4,500 clerks.

Now compare the above to the schedule fixed by Congress for our death-facing, Yankee, fighting, victory-making saviors of civilization—$60 bonus to the $33 soldier.

And the soldier's bonus was paid only once, when he was finally discharged from the pay roll. Many service men do not need a bonus and do not want a bonus, but there are many highly deserving, needy service men who are absolutely in want and who do need help.

AN $870 PER MONTH WASHINGTON FAMILY PLUS BONUS.

The report made by the Interstate Commerce Commission (H. Doc. No. 190, 66th Cong., 1st sess.), made in compliance with resolution introduced by me and passed by House, shows one family of Grahams in the Government service here in Washington, drawing salaries, exclusive of any bonus, as follows: George F. Graham, jr., $325 per month; his brother, William S. Graham, $250 per month; his father, George F. Graham, sr., $100 per month; his mother, Mattie M. Graham, $95 per month; his sister, Nettie F. Graham, $100 per month. And then add the $240 bonuses allowed by Congress.

The above makes such speeches as the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] persisted in making, out of order, in violation of the Chair's ruling, sound like monkey chatter. He not only wanted to pay the 200,000 Government employees the $240 bonus but indicated a willingness to increase their bonus to $480. But let me again call your attention to the vicious threat of these Government employees, published in the press:

CLERKS INDEX CONGRESSMEN—TABULATE SENTIMENT OF LAWMAKERS ON QUESTIONS AFFECTING SALARY.

All employees in the Government service, whether they live in Washington or San Francisco, will soon know just who are their friends or enemies in Congress, and they will be strongly urged to vote accordingly at the coming elections.

The National Federation of Federal Employees, in its headquarters at 1423 New York Avenue, is busily engaged at present card indexing every Representative in the Capitol as an important part of the voters' information bureau which has been established by the federation.

The sentiment of Congressmen on the legislative program of the Federal Employees' Union has been carefully followed, and every vote cast for or against measures of concern to Federal employees has been tabulated.

SIMILAR TO AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR PLAN.

The union legislative program, including such issues as minimum wage, retirement, and numerous other measures, together with the attitude of each Congressman toward the program, is being prepared to send broadcast to the headquarters of the locals throughout the United States.

The system being followed by the national federation is similar to that of the American Federation of Labor in keeping tab on officials' attitude toward labor.

The employees' union will not only keep its membership of nearly 100,000 informed but will disseminate as well its voting information to every employee in the Government service.

WATCH NEW CANDIDATES.

While present Congressmen will be the principal subject of such a list, new candidates for the office will not be overlooked. It is planned to sound out thoroughly each new aspirant to Congress as to his attitude toward the Government employee.

The National Federation of Federal Employees is massing its full strength to procure a friendly Congress. Not only will it blacklist certain Members of Congress but every effort will be made to have every employee in the Government service exercise his full voting right.

To encourage voting among nonresident employees in Washington, the federation is completing data on election laws, election dates, and other information relative to every State in the Union, which can be handily gotten by calling at the headquarters of the federation.

FORTY THOUSAND IDLE, UNNECESSARY EMPLOYEES.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has an intimate knowledge of departmental affairs, has agreed with me that we have on the Government pay rolls now here in Washington 40,000 useless, idle, unnecessary clerks, who ought to be sent home instead of being paid a big salary and a bonus.

Let me read you the pertinent parts of a letter which yesterday I received from Hon. Herbert D. Brown, Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, replying to specific questions I had propounded to him:

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I have just received your letter of March 2, in which you make certain inquiries concerning personnel conditions in the executive departments in Washington. I will quote your questions and undertake to answer them in the order in which they appear in your letter:

"(1) Both Congressman MADDEN and myself estimate that there are now in Washington 40,000 idle, unnecessary clerks still on the pay roll, whose services could be dispensed with without crippling the service. Is this true or not?"

I do not know whether your figures are correct or not, because I have not had the opportunity to find out. I know that there are a great many unnecessary clerks in Washington (literally thousands), but whether the number of them is 20,000, 40,000, or some other figure, I can not say. I know that there are very many superfluous clerks in Washington, because investigations made by the Bureau of Efficiency in certain offices have disclosed that fact. Whether this condition is general throughout the departments I am not prepared to say without making a comprehensive survey of the whole service. With the limited force of investigators at my disposal, I am unable to make such a survey at the present time.

There is no doubt in my mind but that it would be possible for administrative supervisors to reduce the number of their clerical assistants very greatly: (1) Because the volume of work in the departments to which they are attached is considerably less than it was during the period of the war when many of these clerks entered the service, and (2) because, now that the war strain is over, time can be found in the departments for improvement of methods. Whether the resulting reduction in the force would amount to 40,000 workers, which would be approximately 40 per cent of the total number now engaged, I am not prepared to say.

It is only fair to the administrative officers to say that present conditions have grown out of unusual circumstances. The war emergency made it necessary to organize many new offices and to expand practically every existing governmental agency overnight. The times were abnormal and heads of departments and independent establishments were placed at an enormous disadvantage in handling organization problems. Ordinary principles of efficiency could not always be applied under these circumstances. The departments have, however, now passed the peak of the war load. It should, in my opinion, be possible at this time to institute a program of strict economy.

"(2) May we expect efficient service generally from our employees as long as they are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?"

I believe that the affiliation of Government employees with labor organizations must, of necessity, result in a reduction of efficiency in the departments. I am of the opinion that such affiliation has an unfortunate effect on the morale of the service. The employee comes to feel that his success depends not so much on his individual effort as on the political strength of the organization to which he belongs.

"(3) Is there not fully as much reason for separating our Government employees from strike organizations as there was for separating the police and firemen from such organizations?"

Yes, quite as much reason, and even more. In the event of police strikes or strikes involving a fire department it will always be possible, because of the relatively small number of people involved, for residents of the community to assume the burdens laid down by the striking policemen or firemen, and while it is true that inexperienced persons would not be able to safeguard the public interests to the same extent as could regular policemen or firemen, yet the danger to the community could be kept within reasonable bounds and situations of this sort could be taken care of with a relatively small loss to the public. In the case of a strike of Government workers, which might involve not merely a few employees, but practically the entire force in the Government service, the damage to the public interest would be far greater. Such a strike would practically result in the suspension of all the functions of the Federal Government. It would affect not merely a few people, or a few thousand people, but, practically speaking, the entire population of the country.

"(4) I call your attention to the attack made upon you in the Federal Employee, the official magazine of the National Federation of Federal Employees, for February 28, 1920, page 3 thereof, suggesting your demise, by reason of your late activities for efficiency. Is this veiled threat of the official organ of Government employees going to stop your activities and cause you to 'lay down?'"

My answer to this inquiry is, "No." I shall continue to work for economy and efficiency in the Government service without regard to threats that may be made by any person or organization.

Very sincerely, yours,

HERBERT D. BROWN,
Chief Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. Chairman, is this Congress going to act on the advice thus given by the Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency? Or, are we, as usual, going to let this recommendation for real efficiency and economy pass from us like "water off of a duck's back" and profit in no way by it?

The said Federal Employee for February 28, 1920, devoted pages 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 to this unwarranted and vicious attack upon Chief Brown, of this Bureau of Efficiency, because of his late efforts for efficiency, and winds up with the following:

The union label stands primarily for union industry. As such it is an indispensable complement of "home industry," or other shibboleth of business, in the mind of the purchaser who holds principle above local pride.

These 100,000 Government employees in Washington will not let any clerk stay in the Government employ long unless he or she joins the union. They are organized to the teeth. And these $2,500, $3,500, and $4,500 Government clerks who are now demanding bonuses of $480, $360, and $240, respectively, work 7 hours per day, in comfortable buildings, under pleasant surroundings, are given 30 days' vacation each year on full pay, 30 days' additional sick leave on full pay upon doctor's certificate, have all of their 52 Sundays, all regular holidays, half of every Saturday during the three summer months, and holiday on every special occasion numerously occurring in Washington. Many of the lady clerks wear expensive furs in July and décolletté in December. Are they going to drive Congress with threats? If they do, the people will likely get them a new Congress.

The National Federation of Federal Employees last night opened fire upon the Republican Party, and in an official statement charged that it is Republican leaders of the House who are responsible for reducing the salaries of about 200,000 Government employees by eliminating the $240 bonus. * * * Congressman WOOD said: "If we could have reached an agreement with Representative JOHN R. NOLAN, of California, not to introduce an amendment to increase the bonus to $480, as representative of the National Federation of Federal Employees, we could have put through the bill carrying the $240 bonus." * * * The Federation claimed: "Our canvass showed a very general sentiment in favor of the increased bonus."

If there were such a very general sentiment in favor of an increase of the bonus to $480 for these 200,000 civilian employees, may I ask whether any of it was produced by these vicious threats of this Federal employees' organization?

Doubtless among some of these 200,000 employees there are some who deserve promotions and raises in salary. But as one of the chiefs in the Department of Agriculture asserted to the Committee on Agriculture, as detailed the other day by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], there are some incompetent, inefficient employees whom the department will not discharge because they belong to the union and the union would not let them. I am in favor of discharging every incompetent, inefficient employee on the Government pay roll and then increasing the pay of the efficient clerks. But their organization does not deserve any consideration when it attempts to pass legislation through browbeating and threats.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, is Mr. CARSS or Mr. BURKE present? I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BURKE. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object if the gentleman confines his extension of remarks to this question.

Mr. BLANTON. I will confine them to the question I am discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, a great economic mistake will be made, in my opinion, if the action taken by the House in reducing the appropriations providing for the activities of the Federal Government in cooperating with the farmers toward increasing production is sustained by the Senate and the regular appropriations for the control of hog-cholera work, the tubercular testing of cattle, the investigation of range conditions in the national forests, and similar appropriations are denied. The organizations which have been built up under these appropriations will be so reduced that the decrease in food production and the loss to the farmers will be enormous.

The events of the past five years have clearly established two facts which are of vital importance to us at this time. The first, that a well-organized agriculture, intelligently conducted, is the best security that any nation can have against unemployment, a financial panic, or bolshevism. The second, that our modern industrialism, which tends to separate more and more people from the soil and draw them together in great cities, is a house built upon sand. This foundation is now failing and the nations are being destroyed.

As a Nation we are now facing a situation which calls for the most serious consideration of these two great interests. The further promotion of our own industrialism to the neglect of our agriculture and rural home building involves lines of policy as divergent as the two poles. It should be clear to all that the time is at hand when we must dig beneath the surface and strengthen the foundation of the industrial system which during the past few years we have erected at such cost and which to-day is causing us such anxiety. The strengthening of this base involves the question of agriculture, more particularly in its relation to the building of rural homes.

We have become a great Nation because we have always had an abundance of land—free, or practically so, for the asking—with ready markets in the Old World for all that this land could produce beyond our own needs. For more than 50 years past our improved farm area has been increased at an average rate of about 7,000,000 acres each year. Our Nation is now so big and its development is so rapid that to check its growth along the lines which have been followed ever since colonial days would be fatal. We must continue to make the utilization of land the basis of our growth and prosperity as long as we have any land remaining fit for settlement, especially in view of the crisis which the world is now facing.

Eighty years ago to-day's industrial system was undreamed of. Nearly 70 per cent of the people of this and of all other countries lived upon the land. To-day nearly 70 per cent of the people of the so-called "industrial world" are engaged in trade and the industries. These hundreds of millions have become completely separated from the soil, most of them crowded together in towns and great cities, the sole dependence of a majority being a weekly pay check. Never before, under such circumstances, has civilization faced a crisis like the present one. At this moment more than half of this industrial world is in ruin because this pay check has been cut off. The other half—our half—is threatened.

WHY OUR AGRICULTURE IS DECLINING.

Our agriculture is great only in the aggregate of its 7,000,000 unorganized units. It is unable to compete with the industrial system which we have developed for the man power that is required for its own expansion merely to keep pace with the needs of our increasing population. To enter the industries and establish economic independence the young man or woman from the country needs only brains and energy. But to establish a home upon the land and engage in farming the settler must be a capitalist of no mean degree. Is it any wonder, therefore, that many of the young men and women, born and raised on the farm, go to the towns and great cities? Where else would they go to make a living? Is it surprising that, under these conditions, our agriculture is declining?

For these reasons the drift of population is cityward. If we stand still, if we make no effort, rest assured it will continue to drift in that direction, for back of it is a great unsolved economic cause which will not "settle itself," and what is more, we know full well it will not do so.

The further expansion of our industries is safe only as we reestablish and extend its base. This can be done only by placing as many millions as possible in possession of natural agents of production, so their economic independence will be assured. The needs of these millions always will be the best market for the products of our modern industries.

But for years we have been exactly reversing this principle. As a Nation we have been exerting every effort to extend our trade in other lands, while offering every inducement to our best blood, whose business is agriculture, to leave the soil so the ranks of industry might be kept full, forgetting that within our own borders were sources of untold wealth only awaiting the touch of labor to quicken them into productive life.

THE GOVERNMENT MUST ASSIST IN PLACING PEOPLE UPON THE LAND.

To stand still is to see our population continue to drift cityward. To correct this tendency requires effort. The Government must again become active in a field in which it has lost practically all interest since the passing of the free agricultural lands of the public domain. The soundness of the policy of our Government in allotting an empire of rich lands to its citizens, free and ready to plow, is best evidenced by the millions of farm homes that have been established. In order to meet the normal demand of our increasing population we must continue somehow to establish these farm homes at the rate of more than 100,000 each year.

Such homes must be established upon the land or the population of our cities will be further increased without a corresponding development of our agriculture.

But all of the best and most available free agricultural lands of the public domain have been appropriated. In fact, about the only available lands for the further expansion of our agriculture and rural home building are the idle or "waste" lands of the country. These lands must first be cleared, drained, or irrigated before crops can be grown. This involves an average cost of probably $75 per acre. The settler can not live upon such land until it has been made ready for cultivation. He can not finance an irrigation or drainage project costing millions of dollars, nor does this obligation necessarily devolve upon private capital. With the assistance of the Government such work can successfully be done and the settler placed upon the land under conditions which will insure his success.

WE MUST NOW DEVELOP AND SETTLE OUR WASTE LANDS.

Our agriculture has entered upon a stage where to insure its proper expansion the cooperation of the Government is imperative. This cooperation must provide for the gradual development and use of our waste lands.

The early settlers of the West were the pioneers in land reclamation. This was because the rainfall over the western one-third of the United States was not sufficient for crops during the growing season. So most of the agriculture throughout that section is based upon irrigation. Out of the needs of the early settlers of the irrigation States there has been developed a system of irrigation, with its magnificent engineering works, its laws and decrees, the greatest and most perfect in the world.

About 20 years ago this development entered upon the stage which demanded the use of resources that were beyond the command of the individual or community, and Congress finally authorized the Government to lend its cooperation in the reclamation of its own and other lands through the construction of irrigation works. For this purpose there were placed at the disposal of the Government the receipts from the sale of public lands; later on these funds were augmented by a loan of $20,000,000. To date about $120,000,000 has been expended for this purpose. It is estimated that more than $100,000,000 is needed to complete existing projects, which contain a total area of about 3,000,000 acres, less than 2,000,000 of which are now under irrigation. The productive wealth that has been created through the expenditures of this amount fully justifies the policy of the Government.

However, the reclamation act has now been in operation nearly 18 years. With adequate funds available, at least five years would be required for the completion of these projects, making a total of 23 years for the addition by such means of only 3,000,000 acres to the improved farm area of the country, less than 2 per cent of the total increase during that time.

But western irrigation is now entering upon another stage in its development. Projects must now be constructed which involve the expenditure of many times the cost of any existing undertaking.

The means for continuing such work are therefore totally inadequate to meet the demand of that great and growing section of the country. But this is not all. The reclamation of land is now necessary in other parts of the country, for, as stated, we have arrived at the point in the expansion of our agriculture where the waste land is most available for such purpose.

DEMAND FOR GOVERNMENT COOPERATION GENERAL THROUGHOUT COUNTRY.

Most of this waste land is in the West and South, and the people of those sections are now making common cause in support of a plan which provides for the cooperation of the United States in the reclamation and settlement of land of this character. The demand in the West is by the governors of the arid States, State irrigation associations, and commercial bodies acting in concert through the Western States Reclamation Association, and in the South by the concerted action of its governors through the Southern Commercial Congress. The plan is also supported by the National Reclamation Association, the Mississippi Valley Association, and numerous other organizations in affiliation with these bodies.

DESCRIPTION OF PROPOSED FEDERAL AND STATE COOPERATIVE ACT.

The plan, briefly described, is predicated upon the fact that for the past 17 years the Congress of the United States has been committed to the policy of land reclamation and dedicated certain public revenues for that purpose. The oil-land leasing act contains a provision for augmenting these revenues. Under the provisions of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto these revenues for the prosecution of such work, although totally inadequate, are assured.

Under the plan proposed in the bill which I have introduced (H. R. 12649) "to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces," it is provided that such work shall be extended more rapidly by increasing the fund available for construction purposes. This is to be done by issuing United States bonds in amounts not exceeding $20,000,000 the first year, $30,000,000 the second, $40,000,000 the third, and $50,000,000 the fourth and succeeding years, the total of such issues not to exceed $350,000,000. No issues are to be made after the tenth year. These bonds are to bear interest at 4½ per cent and are to be payable in not to exceed 50 years.

It is proposed that such portion of the revenues from public lands as may be needed, which now are being used as a constructive fund for reclamation, shall be available for the payment of the interest and principal on these bonds. It is also proposed that all new projects shall be placed upon an interest-paying basis, and that they shall be organized into irrigation or drainage districts with taxing powers, and that such projects shall issue bonds equal to the estimated cost of reclamation. These district bonds are to be deposited with the Federal Farm Loan Board, to be used as collateral security for issues of United States collateral bonds. But such collateral bonds will not be issued and sold until the land is developed and settled and has a value equal to twice the face value of the district bonds. The proceeds from the sale of the collateral bonds will be placed to the credit of the reclamation fund to be available for the reclamation of other lands.

The system of financing which the bill provides is similar to the Federal farm-loan system, and assuming that it is the intention of Congress to continue the present reclamation policy at least until a better one is devised, and to use the public revenues referred to for that purpose, no part of the money that will be used for construction under the provisions of this bill will have to be furnished by the taxpayer. It will all be subscribed by the investing public.

No issues of United States bonds will have to be made after the tenth year. By that time the early projects will be going concerns, and the assets that will have been created will be liquid and available for further financing. This plan will provide a construction fund fully six times as great as the present one, while it will apply to all parts of the country and will lend itself to all forms of land reclamation. This fund will amount to $440,000,000 by the end of the tenth year and nearly $1,000,000,000 by the twentieth year.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR FORMER SERVICE MEN AND WOMEN IN THE SETTLEMENT OF LAND.

For the protection of those who must settle these lands the bill provides that all tracts in single ownership in excess of limits finally to be established by the Secretary of the Interior shall be sold at prices and on terms to be fixed by agreement with him before approval of the project may be given. In the sale or entry of all lands that may have to be settled preference is given to service men and women who have served in the military and naval forces of the United States in the war with Germany. This provision will be of great advantage to such class and may be enjoyed at any time in the future.

Under the plan proposed the cost of reclamation will be a tax against the land. This leaves the loan value of the land practically unimpaired. Should any State desire to make advances to settlers for improvements or for the purchase of live stock, such advances could be secured by a first mortgage on the land. The same advantage would hold should Congress make provision for the settlement of soldiers, for Congress would only have to provide such amounts as might be required for loans for making improvements, and so forth, and these loans could be secured by mortgage on the land, or such loans could be made by the Federal land banks. No direct appropriation would have to be made by Congress for the reclamation of the land.

A SOUND BASIS FOR COOPERATION.

The plan admits of the closest cooperation between the community, the State, and the Government. The community must initiate the undertaking and provide the proper organization for the purpose. Most of the States already have enacted district laws which will meet the requirements of this measure. They will be free to cooperate by assisting the settler, and many of the States will avail themselves of this opportunity. The United States, through its trained engineers and executives, who have had many years of experience in this field, will have the last word in the selecting of projects for construction; while the Federal farm-loan board will satisfy itself as to the value of the land that will have been reclaimed and settled before the investing public is invited to purchase the securities that will be offered.

The plan of reclamation proposed will be self-continuing, and through its application all of the waste lands of the United States ultimately can be reclaimed and be made sources of great wealth. This can be done without placing a burden of any kind upon the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, during the past few weeks, and again last Saturday, there has been shown a disposition in another body to attack one of the leading countries and its citizens who have come here. I refer particularly to Italy.

Some gentlemen first obtain knowledge and then forget to retain it and recollect it when speaking in Congress. In 1915 when the Allies were struggling as never before Italy came to their help and rescue. As one of those who went over in 1918 to Italy, I saw where the Italian forces had to go in order to fight the Austrians and the Germans—12,000 feet high, making their own way up there not by wagon, not by other mechanical aid, but by foot, dragging cannon and the military supplies up in that manner. They got their water dragged up by ropes and cables. I then realized how the battles had been fought and how they had been won against odds which appeared insurmountable. At that time, if Italy had not responded, Germany and Austria would have won the war.

It ill becomes anybody at this or any other time to refer disparagingly to one particular country at one time and then to another brave race—the Irish—at another time. Why denounce any country and any race who have sacrificed what these people have for the Allies?

I turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and see how this House and the other body received the Italian Commission when it came here. We find it full of praises extended to these men. When they denounce them, they are assailing such men as Marconi, Cardoni, Dias, and Nitti. Why hold up unjustly the men who come to this country to do our rough work and try in every way to become real American citizens? I say that there were more men of that particular race under the age of 18 who went into the American Army when war was declared than of any other race in the United States, and it is about time we commence to recognize that fact and give them the credit they deserve.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman from California yield me one minute more?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HERSEY. I wish to know for information to whom the gentleman alludes when he speaks of the attack on the Italian people.

Mr. SIEGEL. It was made in another body.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is a parliamentarian, and he will not disobey the rules of the House.

Mr. SIEGEL. And I will say for the information of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that I hope he will find time to read the RECORD and give us his views on the subject, in view of the fact that he speaks daily here.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman as to the valiant fight that many of Italy's citizens conducted over there.

Mr. SIEGEL. I sincerely hope that the American people will realize once for all that all nationalities, all creeds, and all races help to make America what it is, and that we will continue to be Americans in the fullest sense of the word and appreciating what each and every one is trying to do to make this country grander and greater and better. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, for the information of the House I insert what I have previously said:

"Mr. Speaker, the South has been welcoming the Italian war mission, which arrived here on May 23, and wherever its members have come they have been acclaimed by all of our citizens. It has, indeed, been a triumphal progress which has been awaiting them wherever they have journeyed throughout the United States, and within a few days the people of New York City will extend to them a reception which will equal that which has been bestowed unto Gen. Joffre and Mr. Balfour. It is, indeed, a remarkable change that has occurred in the state of mind of many of our people. Newspapers and others that had in the past plastered the Italian immigrant that has come here with charges and insinuations which those who have come in contact with the Italian people have known to be untrue are now engaged in singing their praises. It has taken this war to awaken many of our people to the realization that the men who have come from Italy have worked here by the sweat of their brow, performing the most arduous kind of labor in all kinds of weather, and many times for small wages. They are commencing now to recognize the fact that whatever may have been said against the Italian immigrant was not expressed after careful thought or deep study. It was the off-handed expression of men who had reached hasty conclusions without thorough investigation. Many things may be said against the city of New York by those who do not know its fullness of heart and its depth of soul. Nowhere in this country is merit more quickly appreciated, regardless of race, creed, or color.

"Many people have said of New York that it was a self-satisfied municipality, devoid of real patriotism, and given over to gross materiality. Others have said that it was not an American community, and yet during the past week it has not only subscribed but more than subscribed the amount of Liberty loan bonds that it was expected that its people would take. It presents a lesson to be emulated by all other cities throughout the country, and it points with pride that within its gates are to be found men, women, and children who have come from all over the world and from every part of the United States, proud and happy to be a part of it, ready to do their duty to the country, and amongst these is the greatest Italian population to be found in any city of the world.

"They are making good progress in every line of endeavor, whether in education, art, or music. They are taking an active interest in civic matters in the city of New York, and the boys of Italian descent can be found in our Army and Navy equal in proportion to the ratio of their population to that of the rest of the country.

"The coming of the Italian mission to the United States is bound to increase our respect for the men who have come from Italy, and when people commence to read, to study, and learn more about those who are in their midst and the country from whence they have come the usual result of knowledge follows, namely, greater respect for neighbors and a feeling of gratitude as well as appreciation for their coming. No words of mine can give adequate praise to the invention of the wireless by one of the members of this mission, Senator William Marconi, and if Italy was only entitled to the admiration of the world for giving to it Marconi and his invention, then posterity would gladly bestow it, but Italy has done more in this war than is generally known.

"Italy entered the conflict with the idea of having paid back to her the Provinces along the Trentino and Trieste fronts, and has spent about $400,000,000 each year since. It is a remarkable fact that in 20 years' time Italy had so reduced her national debt that at the time when it became one of the belligerents it had only 5 per cent of it due and owing to foreign nations, or, in other words, in a score of years Italy had been able to redeem 45 per cent of its national debt.

"The following editorial from the New York Times of May 24, 1917, has this to say about Italy:

"ITALY.

"It is of good augury that the Italian war mission arrived in Washington yesterday. On May 23, 1915, the Italian Government informed Baron Burian, the Austro-Hungarian foreign minister, that Italy would regard herself as at war the next day; and the first blood in the war between the two nations was shed on May 24. Memorable and splendid were those days and nights of popular emotion in May. At last the great net of German intrigue was torn apart by an angry democracy. From the Villa Malta, on the Pincian Hill, Prince Von Buelow, the some time chancellor, cleverest of German diplomatists and men of the world, married to a patrician Italian woman, familiar with the Italian language and Italian politics, German special ambassador since the preceding December, had brought to bear all the arts of persuasion, intimidation, corruption.

"The great Roman families, the plutocrats, the industrialists, the Vatican, and the 'blacks'—every class was wheedled; and every class had seemed content with neutrality. Socialists and the bourgeoisie, the army to a considerable extent, the docile, obedient politicians of the Italian Chamber, experts in the gospel of the spoils and machine politics, practiced to perfection for years by the great boss, in or out of office, Giovanni Giolitti; finance, a host of intellectuals, had sworn by Germany. Bismarck had driven Italy into the triple alliance, sowed hatred between her and France by encouraging the latter to take Tunis, 'an Italian colony guarded by French soldiers,' as some Italian statesman has called it, just as Italy was reaching for it. Bismarck, too, had played the Vatican against the Quirinal. Italy had nowhere else to go. If Austria was her old foe and oppressor, to Prussia she owed the recovery of Venetia; to the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War, Rome.

"Germany had 'penetrated' the peninsula. The country was prosperous, but the Banca Commerciale, a German institution with an Italian name, had come in 20 years largely to control industry, finance, business. It had money and jobs, a manifold clientage, retainers of all sorts, a powerful press, strong, numerous friends in city and national government. It was the boss behind the boss. It was the director and intimate of Giolitti.

"Let us remember these things. Let us remember the high, generous passion that swept all the Germanophile obstructions away. Belgium and the Lusitania, Ypres and Rheims had stirred the multitudes, though the sleek parliamentarians did not know it. There had been riots in the cities in the early spring, demonstrations at the embassies of the Allies. Giolittists had been attacked in the streets. The King had shown his wish, as far as he could. On May 5, 1860, Garibaldi and The Thousand left Quarto, near Genoa, on that strange, romantic expedition to free Sicily. There was to be a celebration on May 5, 1915. The King—King 'by the grace of God and the will of the people'—wrote of Garibaldi's setting forth 'with an immortal daring toward an immortal goal.'

"How d'Annunzio, no longer an Apuleian or a Petronian novelist, but a patriot-poet, wearing the laurel of Carducci, spoke nobly for 'Greater Italy' at Genoa and Rome, spoke in the Forum to multitudes, denouncing Giolitti as a criminal and a traitor, denouncing 'the lackeys of the Villa Malta'; how in all the cities there were great popular proally demonstrations; how Giolitti's parliamentary majority melted away, the Salandra-Sonnino ministry was sustained, and war was voted by both chambers, only a few Socialists and bitter clericals opposing; how the Romans, 200,000 strong, a Colonna, Syndic of Rome, at the head, marched in torchlight procession to the Quirinal; how Giolitti fled to Piedmont—if we have forgotten these things, it is right now to recall them.

"It is right to recall that in the spring of 1915 every omen pointed to German victory. Since the Marne and the Aisne the British and French had done nothing. The Russian armies had begun their long retreat with incredible loss and slaughter. A Teutonic movement on Kieff or Odessa was looked for by many. Separate peace offers to Russia by Austria and Germany were reported to the Italian foreign office. In dark days, to be followed by dark days, the Italian democracy came into the war for democracy. And after Montenegro and Serbia fell, after the Gallipoli fiasco, while the ferocious German assault was thundering against Verdun and Russia was rebuilding her shattered military machine, what would have happened if Austria could have thrown her whole strength on the eastern front?

"For 400 to 450 miles, from the rock of the Carso, past the Carnia and the strange, monstrous, red-stained Dolomites, past the Trentino to the Tonale Pass and Stelvio, the eternal snows of the Ortler and Adamello, everywhere Austria is ramparted by ranges, everywhere Italy has to fight uphill. Wonderfully, with surpassing skill and courage, have her troops under her great chief of staff, Cadorna, fought their difficult fight.

"The Italian war mission is headed by a member of the House of Savoy. One of its members is a king of science. We salute in them and that mission the gifted, strong, and generous democratic nation whose name is dear to the civilized world.

"TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

"SERVICES NOT TO BE FORGOTTEN.

"Italy as a country is as well known to Americans as any in Europe because of the great number of them that have visited it, and its history, up to recent years, forms no small part of our textbooks for secondary and advanced education. We are, however, strangely and, considering the size of our Italian population, rather mysteriously out of touch with modern Italy, and concerning its living men of eminence not many of us know more than a few of their names. So, too, the part which Italy has played in the war is not generally understood and appreciated here, though in proportion to her resources she has probably done at least as much for the good cause as any of its other supporters, and her accomplishments have been neither small nor unimportant.

"To the military achievements of Italy, Il Cittadino, of this city, calls deserved attention, its motive being, of course, to gain for the members of the Italian mission, who have just arrived, recognition in some degree comparable to that which has made so notable the welcome accorded to the representatives of Great Britain and France.

"Even at the beginning of the war, it reminds us, Italy's carefully reasoned and fully justified abandonment of the Central Empires, with which she had been in alliance, was of enormous service, in that it relieved France from what otherwise would have been the task of guarding her Italian frontier. After some months of comprehensible delay Italy entered actively into the war on the side of the Allies, timing her declaration of belligerency so that it stopped the German rush into Russia and compelled Germany and Austria to use against Italy great numbers of troops drawn from the eastern and western fronts. At Durazzo Italy saved the remnant of the Serbian Army—the men now fighting in Macedonia—and she captured Monastir, the only allied victory in that sector.

"And Italy can claim the credit of being the only one of the Allies to carry the war into enemy territory on a really large scale, and thereby she has given anxious occupation to large forces of both Germans and Austrians—forces which, but for her courage and efficiency, would have been available for employment elsewhere and might have affected seriously the course of events.

"Mr. Speaker, Friday, May 24, will be the third anniversary of Italy's entry into the war.

"All over America large mass meetings will be held to commemorate the event. In Washington a notable address is to be delivered by Secretary of State Lansing. In New York at a meeting to be held at the Metropolitan Opera House Secretary of War Baker is to be the principal speaker. Everywhere from coast to coast the flag of Italy will fly side by side with the flag of the United States in recognition of her brave fight for the world's freedom from autocracy and militarism.

"Italy has twice saved the war for the Allies. The first time was when she declared her neutrality at the outbreak of the war. In this manner France was enabled to take the troops which had to be maintained along her boundaries adjacent and adjoining Italy.

"Events are moving so rapidly from day to day during the past few years that each day's doings are quickly forgotten.

"It was in May, 1915, that the battle of Verdun was reaching its greatest intensity and Russia's forces were going to pieces in hasty retreat. The moment Italy declared war she relieved both fronts by the action.

"Many have been the great and heroic deeds of this war, but the world will never forgot the extraordinary deeds of valor performed in the defense of Italy's lines along the Piave River.

"Italy has raised millions of men; and had we listened to the request made by Signor Marconi, the great inventor, when he headed the mission here last year, this war would have been lessened by many months.

"The men who came here from Italy have helped in every way to build up America and have demonstrated their real love and devotion to America by doing their bit in every possible way.

"On April 6 last, the anniversary of America's entry into the conflict, monster demonstrations were held throughout Italy. The Monitor describes it in the following account:

"WAR ANNIVERSARY MARKED IN ITALY.

"ROME, ITALY.

"The Coliseum was chosen as the scene of the public celebration of America's entrance into the war. The arcades were hung with the flags of the allied nations, and in the gallery above the second arcade were the children from the communal schools, wounded soldiers, and representatives of various regiments. A stand had been erected, covered with a great tricolor banner, on which a number of distinguished persons, including ambassadors, ministers, deputies, and representatives of the allied armies had their places. The arrival of Prince Arthur of Connaught was the occasion of an outburst of applause.

"Speaking in the name of the city of Rome, the mayor, Prince Colonna, rendered a tribute of gratitude and admiration to the great American Nation. He was followed by Signor Berenini, minister for public instruction, who made a short speech in honor of the intervention of America, and of the Italian troops fighting on the Piave, as well as of those of France and England. At its conclusion he presented a reproduction of the statue of the Victory of Brescia to the American ambassador.

"In the course of his reply Ambassador Thomas Nelson Page said the issue of the present struggle did not concern merely certain countries or peoples or nations, but the whole human race. What had to be decided was whether men should be free or slaves; free to enjoy the fruits of civilization won by many years of struggle and sacrifice or the slaves of those whose names would remain synonymous for broken faith, brutal force, and ruffianly aggression. After a brief review of the policy followed by Metternich, the speaker described Germany's 40 years of preparation for a war of aggression, and declared that to-day there was no possibility of choice; it was a case of either conquering or being conquered, and let the conquered beware! He spoke of recent events and of the need for the utmost resistance on the part of the Allies. He told his hearers, if the war seemed long and tedious to them, to think what it must be to their enemies. They were a united people, but Austria consisted of a group of a dozen nationalities, in some cases hating their allies more than they hated the enemy and forced to fight for the perpetuation of their own slavery. Germany and Austria stood together as one in this war, and they were bound to become weaker as the Allies became stronger. It was only a question of time, firmness, and resistance.

"Speeches followed from Henry P. Davidson, of the American Red Cross, who expressed his admiration for the efforts Italy had made during the war, and declared that all the resources of the United States would be at the service of the struggle for liberty; from two American deputies, LAGUARDIA and Lenz, and from M. Franklin Bouillon. A message to President Wilson, in honor of the occasion was then read by Guglielmo Marconi and dispatched from the Coliseum straight to Washington.

"In Milan the day was celebrated by a procession through the streets; the flags of the allied nations were displayed and large crowds assembled at the Porta Venezia, the Cathedral Square, and at other places on the route. Speeches were made by the American consul and by Benito Mussolini. The last named said that the people of Milan had wished to meet in order to show the warmth of their feelings toward American democracy. These were not due merely to the help America could give in the way of war matériel and of men but because she had recognized the justice of their cause and had made it her own.

"Signor Mussolini paid a tribute to England, standing firm through the vicissitudes of the struggle, and to the heroism of France. No one, he said, could any longer, in good faith, 'put credence in Germany's lies.' She alone was responsible for the war. They might still have to pass through sad experiences, but just as the men who accompanied Christopher Columbus in his search for America reached land when they thought they had been deceived, 'so we,' declared Mussolini, 'shall undoubtedly obtain the victory if we resist.'

"Prolonged applause followed, and shouts of 'Viva America!' 'Viva Italia!' while the bands played patriotic airs.

"Let us, then, show our appreciation of the great sacrifice being made by Italy by cementing the ties of friendship existing between the two nations. Let us, then, send to Italy a few regiments of our troops, to show her we are with her to the end, and that the Stars and Stripes, now flying over camps at Foggia, Italy, are the symbol of America's guaranty that when peace comes America will never forget Italy's great achievements when the fate of liberty was in the balance."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] has evidenced a keen interest in the passage of this bill. He introduced a resolution sometime ago to investigate the cause of conditions of the Patent Office. He is unavoidably absent to-day, making a speech to his college alumni, and he asked me to state that if he were here he would support the bill.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of my colleague [Mr. SIEGEL], who just preceded me, suggest something that perhaps has been in all your minds, and that is that Americanism has a body to it and lives on earth and not up in the air. We hear a great deal of discussion of this topic these days, and some men when discussing it seem to rise and keep up in the clouds, but Americanism is something of this life and something that must be with us day in and day out.

I believe that the insinuation of the gentleman from Texas in his concluding remarks does as much to undermine real Americanism as anything that can be said by the wildest blatherskite on a soap box. When you suggest continuously that Members of Congress are yielding their support to a measure because of threats on the outside you are sowing the seed of discontent, which the agitator cunningly cultivates throughout the land, and I believe I speak for you when I say that none of us is subjected to threats which persuade us into doing what we believe should not be done in this body. But, nevertheless, men are making reputations daily and adding to those reputations outside of this body by assaults on the membership of it, and they are gaining the front page of the papers by insinuating that we here are docile followers of organized groups. I believe that we as a body honestly seek to represent what we find to be the total opinion of all of the groups in America, and not any particular group in America.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, one of the gravest problems we face is to retain the respect of our citizenship for our representative form of government, for if that form is overthrown we may be forced to accept the soviet form. Those men who daily use Congress as a subject of attack, gaining thereby a moment's fleeting popularity, may by indiscriminate attack do lasting wrong to representative government. We expect, indeed we ask for, just criticism, but we earnestly hope that the criticism shall be wisely directed against the membership rather than against the system of government.

Let us, however, not be unmindful of the fact that our own actions may bring our professions of faith in American institutions and ideals into contempt. A little while ago the feelings of a great number of our people were grievously injured because a public official referred to them in language that did not suggest the fellowship that should exist among Americans. We can not hope by such terms as "dago," "wop," and "sheeny" to make men of foreign birth who are now in our midst feel that they are part and parcel of the only group we represent, the entire American people. [Applause.] These men have thrown off forever allegiance to foreign powers. They till our soil, enter into our mines, build our highways, join us in the Nation's struggles, and contribute to the common welfare. If the process of Americanization shall go on unimpededly, the common speech of Americans must lose the contemptuous terms which cut to the quick those we seek to Americanize. My colleague from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] has paid eloquent tribute to those whose native land was sunny Italy. He has not been extravagant in his praise. The Italian contribution to American life has been too great for any American, especially a member of a legislative body, to hurl harsh epithets against American citizens of Italian ancestry or birth.

This bill as originally contemplated had within its purview the establishment of a separate court of patent appeals. There has been a wide demand for such a court, because of the diversity of the decisions in the courts of the country. There is no finality of decision by one circuit court of appeals, and a great many men have insisted that there should be located in Washington a court of appeals to be known as the court of patent appeals. Men are now denouncing Congress because we spend money and appropriate sums which we must in honor appropriate. The debt of the war must be paid. There are established charges of Government that must be met, but none of these men who, apparently, obtain public applause by their denunciation of the extravagance of Congress ever tell the people of the millions and the billions of dollars that Congress stands in the way of by refusing to accede to every scheme that somebody has in his mind. [Applause.] I dare say there is not a committee of Congress that does not at some time in a session consider some proposition of some large group, an organized group of our citizenship, that contemplates the establishment of a division of Government or a department of Government or a new Cabinet official. Yet men will seek to gain the handclaps of their own constituency, and of a larger constituency, by saying that we are yielding prodigal sums to demands of organized groups and will refuse to tell their constituencies that the money saved by Congress exceeds by billions the money spent by Congress.

This court of patent appeals I hope some day may be a reality, but the suggested system of calling one man from each of the circuits in this country and putting them in Washington did not seem practical to the committee, and I must at this point compliment Judge DAVIS, of Tennessee, a member of our subcommittee, for the laborious work that he put upon this problem of establishing a court. We thought carefully over that proposal of taking a circuit judge from every court of appeals and putting them in Washington, but determined that that would interfere with the proper conduct of the judicial business in the respective circuits. We considered also the taking of the members of some of the present courts, the Commerce Court and like bodies here in Washington, and giving them such jurisdiction, but after going thoroughly into the problem we believed that to designate them would not satisfy the patent bar of America. I suppose no one will herald the fact to the country, however, that the Patent Committee by refusing to establish an independent court or recommend an independent court of patent appeals has saved money to the country. Had we suggested such a court it would have been easy on the floor of Congress or in the public press to say that Congress had found a new way to spend the money of the American people. We have decided to continue a study of the problem and appeal for suggestions to the American bar.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACCRATE. Certainly.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman also call the attention of the House to the fact that we refused to establish the Patent Office as an independent bureau?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes. Likewise the same argument and the same remarks could be directed to that subject. There are a great many men well-intentioned and of good purpose who believe the Patent Office should be a separate department of government. They believe it should be removed from the Department of the Interior. On investigation the committee believed that that was not practicable, and was not in this emergency of our Government an economical proposition, and by refusing to accede to that group, well organized, well directed, of good brains, we have saved the expenditure of thousands of dollars. [Applause.] I sincerely trust that in considering the question as to what you shall do with our governmental employees you will not forget that the Patent Office employees must meet the best patent brains of the country, and when you expect a $3,000 clerk to successfully contend with a $25,000 patent attorney for one of the great industrial interests of the country you are expecting an absolutely impossible thing. We can not expect in the Patent Office to match the brains of Americans in industry with men who only receive $2,500 or $3,000 per annum. That department is for a public purpose, not only for manufacturers, not only for inventors, but for the public, and we should have men there wise enough and able enough to protect all of the American people against any one individual who desires his patent. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the first clause of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This being a legislative bill, is it being read by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. By sections.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Or by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. By sections. The gentleman from Texas will be in order at the end of the reading of this section.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withdraw the motion for the present.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 477 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 477. The salaries of the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall be as follows:

"The Commissioner of Patents, $6,000 a year.

"The First Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $5,500 a year.

"The Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $4,500 a year.

"Five examiners in chief, $5,000 a year each."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the figures "$4,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$5,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the salary of the Commissioner of Patents has been raised $1,000, I believe. The First Assistant Commissioner of Patents is raised $1,000, and the five examiners in chief have had their salaries raised $1,000, or how much?

Mr. NOLAN. The Assistant Commissioner of Patents at the present time receives $3,500. By the adoption of the amendment his salary is now increased $1,500 a year. The five examiners in chief receive $3,500, and the increase for them in this bill makes an increase of $1,500 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Then beginning with the chief clerk under the next section on down the raises have been relatively how much?

Mr. NOLAN. The chief clerk at the present time gets $3,000 and he is raised $1,000 to $4,000. The law examiners get $2,700 and they are raised to $4,000 each, or $1,250. The classification examiner receives at the present time $3,600 and he is raised to $4,200. The examiners in chief, $3,500, and are raised to $5,000. Those are the five examiners in chief provided in section 1. The interference examiner gets $2,700 and he is raised to $2,900.

Mr. BLANTON. So they approximate from $1,000 to $1,500 raise?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. In some cases $600. I will state to the gentleman from Texas that the original bill provided more of an increase. The commissioner was placed at $7,500, the first assistant at $6,000, the assistant commissioner at $5,000, and so on down the line—chief clerk, $4,200; law examiners, $4,200; and so forth.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if the chairman of this committee can give me information whether or not the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee indorses these raises?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not know.

Mr. BLANTON. The matter has not been submitted to him? Has not the steering committee had the matter presented to them?

Mr. NOLAN. Well, the Rules Committee has. I do not know if they took it up with the steering committee or not.

Mr. BLANTON. I was just wondering, Mr. Chairman, under the program of economy concerning which we hear so much daily from the majority leader, the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, and others, how are we going to save this billion dollars that is being heralded to the country as to be saved if we are going to raise all of these salaries? We have passed through the war and now that the war is over and we are in the days of reconstruction and economy and retrenchment with a deficit of $3,000,000,000 staring us in the face, how are we going to meet that emergency when in this bill we raise war-time salaries now during days of peace and when we are increasing them from $1,000 to $1,500 apiece at one clatter, right out of the box?

I do not see how in the world we can get up on the floor and talk about economy and then——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is making statements that the facts do not warrant.

Mr. BLANTON. I am taking what the chairman of the committee said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Richmond, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 167. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes.

INCREASE OF FORCE AND SALARIES IN PATENT OFFICE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That as much of section 440 of the Revised Statutes as follows the words "in the Patent Office" and refers to said office only be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Chief clerk (who shall be qualified to act as principal examiner), $4,000; 6 law examiners, at $4,000 each; examiner of classification, $4,200; 2 examiners of interference, at $3,900 each; examiner of trade-marks and designs, $3,900; first assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, $3,000; 1 second assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs, at $2,700, and 1 at $2,500; 1 third assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs at $2,200, and 1 at $2,050; 6 fourth assistant examiners of trade-marks and designs—2 at $1,800 each, 2 at $1,650 each, and 2 at $1,500 each; examiners—47 principals, at $3,900 each; 100 first assistants—40 at $3,300 each, 30 at $3,100 each, and 30 at $2,900 each; 100 second assistants—40 at $2,700 each, 30 at $2,500 each, and 30 at $2,350 each; 100 third assistants—40 at $2,200 each, 30 at $2,050 each, and 30 at $1,925 each; 100 fourth assistants—40 at $1,800 each, 30 at $1,650 each, and 30 at $1,500 each; financial clerk, who shall give bond in such amount as the Commissioner of Patents may determine, $2,500; librarian, who shall be qualified to act as assistant examiner, $2,700; 8 chiefs of nonexamining divisions, at $2,500 each; 8 assistant chiefs of nonexamining divisions, at $2,100 each; private secretary, to be selected and appointed by the commissioner, $2,000; translator of languages, $2,400; assistant translator of languages, $2,000; clerks—22 of class 4, at $1,800 each; 33 of class 3, at $1,600 each; 100 of class 2, at $1,400 each; 125 of class 1, at $1,200 each; 100 at $1,000 each; skilled draftsmen, 1 at $1,800 and 3 at $1,600 each; 3 draftsmen, at $1,400 each; 40 copyists, at $1,100 each; 36 messengers, at $1,080 each; 13 laborers, at $1,080 each; 50 examiners' aids and 24 copy pullers, who shall be selected without regard to apportionment, $720 each; in all, $1,885,500.

"For special and temporary services of typewriters certified by the Civil Service Commission, who may be employed in such numbers, at $3 per diem, as may, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Patents, be necessary to keep current the work of furnishing manuscript copies of records, $7,500.

"For purchase of law, professional, and other reference books and publications and scientific books, and expense of transporting publications of patents issued by the Patent Office to foreign Governments, $10,000.

"For investigating the question of public use or sale of inventions for two years or more prior to filing applications for patents, and such other questions arising in connection with applications for patents as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Patents, and expense attending defense of suits instituted against the Commissioner of Patents, $2,500.

"For the share of the United States in the expense of conducting the International Bureau at Berne, Switzerland, $750."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the figures "$2,700" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment. I realize that it would be a waste of the time of the committee and of the few Members present—some 25 or 30 of us, who stay here and work and attend to the people's business—it would be a waste of our time to try to change any of these numerous large raises which the Committee on Patents has brought about in this bill. I was in hopes that the steering committee on the other side of the House, which has indicated its lip desire for economy, would step into the breach now before the House and have protected the people of the country against these unreasonable raises.

Now, I am in favor, if there are employees here who are not getting sufficient salary, if they earn by their industry and thrift and efficiency a raise, to give it to them. But to make a blanket raise of from $1,000 to $1,500 for a great many of these employees I think is out of all reason. I realize I would be wasting time by offering the numerous amendments here necessary to change these numerous raises, and I am not going to attempt it, but I want to put this Committee on Patents on notice, and I want to put the Appropriations Committee on notice, and I want to put the steering committee on notice, and I want to put the majority leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] on notice, that when this bill is finished in the Committee of the Whole, I intend to offer a motion to recommit and have all these salaries changed back to amounts at least approximating their present status. And then I hope that the steering committee will come in here and force a roll call and let the Members of Congress go on record on this question of whether they are going to stand for economy and efficiency in this Government, or whether they are going to blindly follow this committee and make a blanket raise in such large amounts for clerks and employees whether they deserve it or not. I do think that the time has come, or it is coming soon, when we are going to be put on notice. The matter I put in the RECORD a while ago contains threats of employees as to what they and their organizations are going to do to Congressmen if they do not support their demands. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE] says it does not affect us. I wish to God it did not affect us, but if you let water run over a rock, and keep running over it, after a while it wears a groove. And they are continually coming to us with their threats and these demands.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not yield, because this is an important subject I am discussing, and it is more important than the interruption by the gentleman from New York.

I want to say this: They say that we are going to hear from them and their organizations in the elections and on the hustings. Our Government clerks say so. They and their affiliated associate, the American Federation of Labor, have placed the distinguished Speaker and "Uncle Joe" CANNON and myself and others on the black list. God knows I am glad to be on their black list with such men as the distinguished Speaker of this House and "Uncle Joe" CANNON, who has faithfully served his country for 44 years in this body. I want to tell you whom else you are going to hear from besides the organized clerks of this country and the organized unions of this country when election time comes; you are going to hear from the people of the country. They are going to ask you whether you voted for this economy motion of this man BLANTON, of Texas, to recommit this bill and get back to economy. They are going to ask you how you stood on some of these many economy and good-government questions that BLANTON has proposed here. They are going to pin you down as to whether or not you have stood for these things that BLANTON has proposed here in behalf of the people, or whether you have voted for these threats and demands. I am getting many letters from your districts now asking me how you stand and whether you are safe to be returned here. Of course, I answer them to the effect that you are my colleagues and that I like you, and that they will have to get your record from your votes. I am not giving you fellows away, but the people of this country are going to examine your records, as well as the organized Government clerks and the unions of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill, it provides for some increases in force in the Patent Office in numbers and increases in the pay of the experts in the Patent Office, and provides for an increase in the cost of obtaining a patent, sufficient to make up the extra cost provided by the bill, both for increase in numbers and increase in pay. I ask the gentleman from California if that is correct?

Mr. NOLAN. The shifting of the fees, the filing and final fees, the legislation that was included in the deficiency bill increasing the cost of patents, practically takes care of the increase in the force and increase in the salaries of the force at the Patent Office.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The report states that there is an increase, due to doubling the cost of copies, estimated at $156,432; increase, estimated, due to raising the filing fee, $382,420, which is quite a bit over $500,000. Do I understand that that statement is correct?

Mr. NOLAN. The increase due to the changing of the filing and final fees would, on last year's estimate, bring in a little over $200,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am reading this statement from the schedule filed with the report made by the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. NOLAN. Page 4 gives you the comparative statement of business from January 1 to December 31.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not wanting the comparative statement. That is, with respect to the growth of the Patent Office.

Mr. NOLAN. In addition to that, the increased business of the Patent Office is given.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The statement here is that the increase in the cost of the copies in the filing of patents will bring in a revenue of more than $500,000 over that which would now be brought in on the same business.

Mr. NOLAN. The increase in cost of copies will bring in approximately $156,000, and in addition to that the increase in the filing fee will bring in $200,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is stated here that that will be $382,000.

Mr. NOLAN. The difference there, if the gentleman will notice, is the final fee at $20 instead of reducing the final fee to $15, as is proposed in this bill. That is the estimated revenue. If the cost of a patent were made $40 instead of $35, if the gentleman will carefully read that statement——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have carefully read it.

Mr. NOLAN. That is based on the $20 final fee. This is based on the $15 final fee. That was given some thought by the committee, but they did not see their way clear to making the final fee $20. We did not leave the final fee at $20.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What I wanted to know was how much increase is estimated to come to the Government by the raises that are made in this bill in the costs?

Mr. NOLAN. The increase that would result under the present bill in the change of the filing and final fee on last year's business is estimated at $200,270, and on the increase in cost of copies $156,432.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a short question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to know if the Patent Office at present is self-sustaining?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It has always been more than self-sustaining, in that the revenue received is more than the appropriations made for its maintenance, although I do not think that is especially important. The fact is this, that the Patent Office now——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will ask for an extension of five minutes. I want to say a word or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Patent Office as now constituted, with the force that it has, is unable to keep up with the current work, and that situation has been made a little worse owing to the conditions of the war and resignations of men in the Patent Office who receive much higher compensation by going into private life. In my judgment, if we will pass this bill into law and increase the compensation of various of the employees and officers of the Patent Office, and increase the charge which is made for patents and copies, and increase the number of experts in the Patent Office, we will not lose money by it, but we will have a greater surplus turned into the Treasury from the Patent Office than would be turned in under present conditions, and instead of being an item of extravagance it is distinctly a bill for economy. It saves money to the Government. It does not lose money for the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very briefly.

Mr. BLANTON. When coal companies increase the price of the mining of coal they add the increase to the selling price, and the people pay it. The people are paying this increase, are they not?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Wait a minute. That is just what I wanted to get at. The people who want this increase are the men interested in patents, who pay the fees. It is not the general public that is paying the bills. The man who is an applicant for a patent wants to have the privilege of paying more money on his application in order that he may have more experts in the department and better qualified experts in the department to pass upon his application. A man who files an application for a patent may lose much by not having it promptly acted upon. He would much prefer to pay $5 more on his application and have it disposed of within a reasonable time, than to pay $5 less and not know whether he is going to get a patent for a year or more. It is purely a matter of business, common sense, and economy. [Applause.] It is to the interest of the Government, to the interest of the patent applicant, of the man who wants to obtain a patent on the invention which he has made. It is to his interest to have this bill passed, and it is to our interest to make him pay for it, and he is willing to pay for it. Why should we object?

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is it not a fact that now complaints come in from all over the country because they can not get attention at the department?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Undoubtedly; and that is the situation, and it is not the fault of the Patent Office. They have lost a large share of their experts. They always will lose them, no matter what salary we pay them. Men in private life will frequently take from the Patent Office some of their best experts and pay them more than the Government is paying them, no matter what we pay them. But they have had great losses in their experts during and since the war, and as a matter of business sense, as a matter of economy, it is to the interest of the Government to increase the force in order to get a sufficient number of men in the Patent Office, to increase the pay in order to obtain more efficient men and retain them in the Patent Office. It is to the interest of the people who seek patents, because it enables them to have their applications acted upon more promptly and efficiently, and it will not cost the Government one cent. You can not make the plea of economy by refusing to pass this bill, because in the end the Government will profit more by the increase in costs than it will spend by the increase in number or salaries of the employees. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 11, strike out the figures "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,100."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 15, strike out "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-seven."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 15, strike out the words "twenty-four" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-nine."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 17, strike out "$1,885,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,944,740."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee, who has this bill in charge, to the fact that this is not an appropriation bill, and it occurs to me that the insertion of the total named on line 17 would be unusual in a legislative provision. I suggest that it would be better to strike out beginning with the words "in all," because this is an authorization for a certain number of employees, and to amend section 440 of the Revised Statutes, and is in no sense an appropriation bill.

While I am on my feet I would like to ask the chairman of the committee another question. On page 4, in this same section, is a paragraph providing for investigating the question of public use or sale of inventions for two years or more, and so on, $2,500. Is it the intention of the chairman to make that $2,500 a limitation on the amount that can be expended in the future for this purpose? That language would effect a limitation, and if in the future it should become necessary to spend more money for that purpose it could not be appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations if a point of order was made, because the limitation would be in the law.

Mr. NOLAN. The language carried is to provide for that particular amount, the same as in the preceding section.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, if the Committee on Patents have considered the question and want to put into the law a limitation that in the future you can not appropriate more for that purpose——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But it is an authorization which permits an appropriation of that much, which probably would be subject to a point of order on an appropriation bill without the authorization.

Mr. BLACK. Very true, but the point I am making is that if it should become necessary to appropriate $4,000 for this particular purpose at some time in the future, it would be without authorization of law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; but without this language it might be without authorization of law to appropriate one dollar.

Mr. BLACK. That is very true, and I am not complaining of that. I am simply asking if it is intended to limit the authorization to $2,500? If it is not intended to limit it to that amount, the figures "$2,500" ought to go out, because in the future if the Patent Office needed $4,000 for that purpose and the Committee on Appropriations attempted to give it, it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. NOLAN. We feel that the authorization is all that is necessary for the present, and it is as much as the Patent Office feel at this time that they may need.

Mr. BLACK. Very true; but suppose two years from now they need more money? You will have to change the law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You would hardly want to put in here an unlimited authorization. That is not customary.

Mr. BLACK. Probably this authorization is far enough ahead of the actual expenditure so that it will meet practical requirements. That is the point I wanted to bring out. In view of the explanations made by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it is quite clear that no amendment is needed to that provision.

I move to strike out, on page 17, line 3——

Mr. NOLAN. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman to strike out, in line 17, on page 3, the semicolon and insert a period and strike out the remainder of the line beginning with the words "in all."

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be upon the committee amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I offer mine as a substitute for the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee amendment is rejected, then the amendment of the gentleman from Texas can be voted on.

The committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. On page 3, line 17, after the word "each," I move to strike out the semicolon and insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 3, line 17, after the word "each," strike out the semicolon, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 4921 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4921. The several courts vested with jurisdiction of cases arising under the patent laws shall have power to grant injunctions according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of any right secured by patent, on such terms as the court may deem reasonable; and upon a decree being rendered in any such case for an infringement the complainant shall be entitled to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant, the damages the complainant has sustained thereby and the court shall assess the same or cause the same to be assessed under its direction. If proof is not offered or, in the absence of adequate proof of the amount that shall be awarded as damages or profits, the court, on due proceedings had, may adjudge and decree to the owner payment of a reasonable royalty or other form of general damages. And the court shall have the same power to increase such damages, in its discretion, as is given to increase the damages found by verdicts in actions in the nature of actions of trespass upon the case; but in any suit or action brought for the infringement of any patent there shall be no recovery of profits or damages for any infringement committed more than six years before the filing of the bill of complaint or the issuing of the writ in such suit or action, and this provision shall apply to existing cause of action. And it shall be the duty of the clerks of such courts within one month after the filing of any action, suit, or proceeding arising under the patent laws to give notice thereof in writing to the Commissioner of Patents, setting forth in order the names and addresses of the litigants, names of the inventors, and the designating number or numbers of the patent or patents upon which the action, suit, or proceeding has been brought, and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents on receipt of such notice forthwith to indorse the same upon the file wrapper of the said patent or patents and to incorporate the same as a part of the contents of said file or file wrapper; and for each notice required to be furnished to the Commissioner of Patents in compliance herewith a fee of 50 cents shall be taxed by the clerk as costs of suit."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 8, line 7, after the word "direction," strike out:

If proof is not offered or, in the absence of adequate proof of the amount that shall be awarded as damages or profits, the court, on due proceedings had, may adjudge and decree to the owner payment of a reasonable royalty or other form of general damages.

And in lieu thereof insert:

If on the proofs it shall appear that the complainant has suffered damage from the infringement or that the defendant has realized profits therefrom to which the complainant is justly entitled, but that such damages and profits are not susceptible of exact calculation and determination, the court may, on evidence tending to establish the same, in its discretion, receive opinion or expert testimony, which is hereby declared to be competent and admissible, subject to the general rules of evidence applicable to this character of testimony; and upon such evidence the court may adjudge and decree the payment by the defendant to the complainant of a reasonable sum as a royalty or general damages for the infringement.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question. Probably my question should be directed to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. I was not here at the time he made his statement, and it may be that I should have been here in order to be advised. I have been looking over the old section as it appears in Barnes' Code, and I note that all this part, from line 11, on page 8, down to line 23, is new, as is also the previous language from line 7 to line 11, which is stricken out, and the other language offered by way of committee amendment. Now, I take it that it is the purpose of those who have framed this amendment to supplement evidence of damage by expert testimony.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes. To cite a concrete example, suppose a patent is granted on an invention on the stem of a watch, and then some manufacturing concern infringes upon that patent in the manufacture of its watches and sells those watches. Of course, it is impossible to determine just what part of the profit the patent on the stem bears to the entire watch. The result has been that a great many owners of patents have absolutely been deprived of a recovery of damages or royalties for an infringement, because it was impossible to determine the exact amount to which they were entitled.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman pardon me there?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARD. How would expert testimony be sufficient to enlighten the court to determine a reasonable sum of damages in the case cited by the gentleman?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. What is meant is to have expert watch manufacturers and dealers testify and give their opinion as to what proportion of the profit this particular item bears toward the whole. It is the only way to reach a decision. The courts at first held that that was not admissible. Some of the courts have begun to grow more liberal in that respect, but there is a very great diversity of opinion, and some of them do not allow it at all. This provision is intended really to crystallize some decisions that have been rendered, particularly one in the case of U. S. Frumentum Co. v. Lauhoff, in Two hundred and sixteen Federal Reporter, 610. It is intended to crystallize and define and render uniform some rule by which the owners of patents may recover for infringements where it is impossible to define the exact amount of damages which they have suffered.

Mr. GARD. I take it that in line 16 and the following lines there are two classes of evidence. Line 16 provides that the courts may on evidence tending to establish the same.

I presume that means other than what is called opinion or expert witnesses?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARD. This follows the first expression on evidence which had before been given?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Then, in line 20, it provides—and upon such evidence the court may adjudge and decree the payment by the defendant to the complainant of a reasonable sum as a royalty or general damages for the infringement.

Is the word "such" limited to the so-called opinion or testimony or does it mean all the testimony in the case?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It means all the testimony, because the gentleman will note that the amendment follows the general provision which provides that the decree may be rendered in any such case—

In case of infringement complainant shall be entitled to recover in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant the damages the complainant had sustained thereby, and the court shall assess the same or cause the same to be assessed under its direction.

Then follows this provision, that provides that the court may, within its discretion, permit opinion or expert testimony, and in order that it may not be abused the gentleman will note that such testimony is subject to the general rules of evidence applicable to this character of testimony.

Mr. GARD. Then how does the gentleman reconcile this statement in line 16:

The court may, on evidence tending to establish the same, in its discretion, receive opinion or expert testimony, which is hereby declared to be competent and admissible.

If it is declared to be competent and admissible, what discretion is there vested in the court not to receive it?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Whenever there is a case, in the opinion of the court, where it should be admitted it becomes admissible. In other words, it is inadmissible unless the situation arises where it is evident to the court that the complainant has a good cause of action and is unable to establish his damages by the ordinary method of proof.

Mr. GARD. Would it not be better to say the court may on evidence tending to establish the same receive opinion or expert testimony which is declared to be competent and admissible, leaving out the words "in his discretion," because that might be to limit the phrase hereby declared to be competent and admissible.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MACCRATE. Was not the very purpose of the language of the bill to limit opinion evidence only to such cases as the court felt he desired it?

Mr. GARD. It says:

The court may on evidence tending to establish the same receive opinion or expert evidence.

And so forth.

Mr. MACCRATE. That is, heretofore the opinions of the expert have not been admissible. Now the court may say I want it or I do not want it. The difficulty has been heretofore that many a man attempted to prove his case by legal evidence, by the ordinary method of producing witnesses, and failed at a certain point, and the court would have to say the proof is insufficient, and although he believed damage had been suffered and there had been an infringement could give no relief. Under this bill he can say I desire you to submit opinion or expert evidence. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from Tennessee took this up with a great number of distinguished judges and has the opinion of all these men that this language meets the situation.

Mr. GARD. That is what I was inquiring about.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow, I would like to read a letter from Frederick P. Fish, who is an eminent patent attorney, the dean of the patent lawyers. I submitted this for his opinion, he being one of those who drafted the bill in its original form.

FISH, RICHARDSON & NEAVE,
Boston, August 15, 1919.

Hon. EWIN L. DAVIS,
Committee on Patents, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DAVIS: May I suggest a form of amendment that seems to me to meet your view and perhaps to be in some respects more satisfactory in phraseology than the amendment that you prepared?

"If on the proofs it shall appear that the complainant has suffered damage from the infringement or that the defendant has realized profits therefrom, to which the complainant is justly entitled, but that such damages and profits are not susceptible of exact calculation and determination, the court may on evidence tending to establish the same adjudge and decree the payment by the defendant to the complainant of a reasonable sum as a royalty or general damages for the infringement."

In equity cases there always has to be an accounting, and it can be made as expensive or as cheap as the parties please subject to the control of the court. I do not think that the statutes should contemplate awarding damages arbitrarily without adequate proofs taken in the accounting.

It seems to me that all that is necessary is for the accounting to proceed, the parties making an effort to prove what damages or profits there were, if any, which the defendant should pay. If when they have done the best they can it appears that the plaintiff has suffered damages or that the defendant has made profits to which the plaintiff is entitled but that the amount can not be calculated, then the court should, I think, have the right on proper evidence to award general damages.

The suggestion that I have made assumes proof. I think that there should be proofs, and that they should be directed to the determination of the exact amount that ought to be paid. It also assumes that if exact damages and profits can not be calculated the court may, but only "on evidence tending to establish the same," decree a payment in the nature of a royalty or of general damages.

If the matter is dealt with, as I have suggested, the parties would put in such proofs as they desired, both as to the exact damages or profits which should be recovered, or as to what would be fair to award if an exact compensation could not be determined. It seems to me that this leaves the matter exactly as it should be left. I am certain that no power should be given the courts to order a payment without proofs and that should not be troubled with the question whether an accounting was worth while.

I should be glad to know how this form that I have suggested appeals to you.

Very truly, yours, F. P. FISH.

Mr. GARD. I think that is all right. The only question I had was the use of the words "in his discretion" as qualifying the admissibility of the testimony.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not think those words have any special force; I think when its says the court may it leaves it in his discretion. I do not think it is vitally important.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman advise me if the language on page 9, lines 7 to 24, is new language?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It is new language beginning with the word "and," on page 9, line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Patents Committee to the fact that, on page 9, line 7, the word "cause" should be "causes." This is simply a recitation of the statute in which the word "causes" is used and should be used. I move to amend by striking out the word "cause," in line 7, page 9, and inserting the word "causes" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 7, strike out the word "cause" and insert in lieu thereof the word "causes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 9, line 11, by inserting after the word "order" the words "so far as known."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 11, after the word "order," insert the words "so far as known."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we ought not to require the clerk to do something which possibly he can not do. He may not know the addresses of all the defendants.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion is proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 4934 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4934. The following shall be the rates for patent fees:

"On filing each original application for a patent, except in design cases, $20.

"On issuing each original patent, except in design cases, $15.

"In design cases: For 3 years and 6 months, $10; for 7 years, $15; for 14 years, $30.

"On every application for the reissue of a patent, $30.

"On filing each disclaimer, $10.

"On an appeal for the first time from the primary examiners to the examiners in chief, $10.

"On every appeal from the examiners in chief to the commissioner, $20.

"For copies of records made by the Patent Office, excluding printed copies, 10 cents per hundred words.

"For each certificate, 25 cents.

"For recording every assignment, agreement, power of attorney, or other paper of 300 words or under, $1; of over 300 and under 1,000 words, $2; and for each additional thousand words or fraction thereof, $1; for each additional patent or application included in one writing, where more than one is so included, 25 cents additional.

"For copies of drawings, the reasonable cost of making them."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 10, line 4, by striking out the figures "15" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "20."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 4, strike out the figures "15" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "20."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the present law requires a fee of $15 on each original application for a patent. This bill proposes to increase that sum to $20. The present law requires a fee of $20 on the issuance of an original patent. This bill proposes to decrease that amount to $15. I do not think there is any demand for that decrease, and if we make the fee $20 in each case, it will more than pay all of the extra employees and compensation provided for in the bill. Unless gentlemen have some very strong argument for a reduction of this fee, I think we ought to keep the fee where it is now, having by the bill increased the fee for filing from $15 to $20. I can see no special reason for increasing one and decreasing the other.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee had in mind in considering this bill the raising of additional revenue so that the increased cost of running the Patent Office might be met by a rearrangement of the fees and an increase of certain fees. It was pointed out to us that by changing the filing fee from $15 to $20 and the final fee from $20 to $15, approximately $200,000 would be secured in additional revenue. We had in mind only keeping the Patent Office about in the same relative position it is in today—that is, so far as its surplus is concerned—and not creating any considerable addition in the way of surplus. In the year 1919 there were 76,484 applications for patent. There were final fees paid during that year on 36,680, so that a little less than 40,000 of those 76,000 patents were finally adjudicated. That is about the percentage it runs in the Patent Office. In changing the fees, as we propose, it increases the revenue approximately $200,000 from the fees in connection with the cost of a patent. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be adopted—and I do not know that there is any serious objection to increasing the cost of a patent from $35 to $40—it would mean about $383,000 increase to the Patent Office from fees, both final and filing.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What assurance has the gentleman that the large excess of fees in 1919 over those in 1918 will increase? Is is not true that in 1918 there was a deficit of $73,419.35 in the Patent Office, while there was an excess in 1919?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What assurance has the gentleman that this excess will continue?

Mr. NOLAN. The fact of the matter is that during 1918, due to the fact that men were limited in their opportunity to exploit patents, the number of applications in the Patent Office decreased. The number of applications in the Patent Office during the year 1919, due to the natural increase and the stimulus of invention, very much increased. It is expected that that ratio will go on—seventy thousand and odd applications each year—and that it will possibly increase, because the work of the Patent Office year by year has steadily increased, and the only trouble about it was that there was a falling off in 1917 as against 1916, due to the fact that only essential industries were allowed to operate in this country.

Mr. BRIGGS. What has been the percentage of increase in the application for patent up until 1918?

Mr. NOLAN. That information is in the hearings, but I could not give it to the gentleman offhand.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is not the increase in 1919 due in large measure to the fact that during the war they fell off, and that in 1919, the war having terminated for practical purposes, a flood of new applications came on, and it might not be reasonable to expect the same ratio would continue for 1920?

Mr. NOLAN. I do not think there is any doubt of it. I think if there is any chance of getting prompt action in the Patent Office, the number of applications will increase. A lot of men in this country will not apply for a patent, due to that fact.

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the committee that the reason for increasing the application fee to $20 and reducing the final fee to $15 was not only to provide additional revenue but to adjust the fees to the work done by the department. The suggestion was made to the committee that $20 was a fairer fee for application than $20 for final issuance. The work of the Patent Office in the preliminaries of the application deserves $20, while the final fee of $15 would be more nearly adequate for the service rendered there. The Patent Office has heretofore made money; and while it may be true, as suggested, that the increase for 1919 is to a large extent due to the fact that patent applications were withheld during the war, nevertheless the natural growth of the Patent Office justifies the conclusion that there will be about $200,000 of increased revenue as a result of this transfer of $20 to the application and $15 to the final issuance.

May I suggest, in answer to what was said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], that when a governmental department is able to increase salaries for services rendered without any appropriation from the Federal Treasury, and when the people who receive the service are satisfied with the charge, Congress certainly ought not to be blamed for its action in raising salaries. A man who will promise to recommit a bill before the bill is argued or heard or discussed certainly can not expect to take much credit from this House, in view of the fact that under this bill $200,000 of money comes into the Treasury that otherwise would not come. I hope, in the interest of the inventor, that we will not saddle this extra $5, because the Government is making and has heretofore made money from the Patent Office. I do not believe the American people expect us to require the department to earn a great surplus every year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I did not know whether this would be opposed by the committee or not. I would like to have the attention of Members for a moment. I have been told repeatedly, and I have no doubt that similar information has come to many Members of Congress from men interested in obtaining patents, that they want more efficient help; that they want more help; that they were willing to pay for it; and I supposed when this bill was reported it was the intention to increase the number and pay of employees, which means increase their efficiency and increase the fees to be receivd by the Government sufficiently to pay for the increase in the numbers and pay of the employees. The present law provides for a filing fee on the original application of $15. The committee proposes to raise that to $20. That will raise $200,000. The present law provides for a $20 fee when the patent is issued. The committee proposes to reduce that to $15. That will cost the Government $182,000. Outside of the increase in the cost of copies of patent proposed by this bill, very largely not obtained by inventors at all, the total cost of increasing the pay and the number of employees will come out of the Federal Treasury. If we keep the fee for obtaining the patent at $20, where it now is, we will obtain $182,000 more than we will if we reduce it.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. NOLAN. I am sure the gentleman does not want to make a statement that is not entirely accurate——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have not made any such statement, unless the gentleman's report is wrong.

Mr. NOLAN. Take the report; for instance, I have no objection, I will say, to the increase proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think I understand the gentleman's position——

Mr. NOLAN. In reference to reducing the final fee we had certain things in mind. Take the figures for last year. There were 36,000 final——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And the gentleman wants somebody to multiply. I will give the figures for last year. The estimate, based on the figures of last year, is: Increase due to doubling cost of copies, $156,432; increase that would result if filing fee of applications for inventions be raised from $15 to $20 and final fees be reduced from $30 to $15, $200,000. The increase, if final fees are not reduced, $382,000. There is a loss of $182,000, which the gentleman will admit——

Mr. NOLAN. I mean if we adopt the gentleman's amendment, it will provide additional revenue of $182,000. The bill provides for an additional amount of $200,000, and if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, it will make it $382,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is right. If my amendment is adopted, it will raise an additional revenue of $182,000, and raise enough to equal $511,000 in increase of salaries and increase in numbers of employees. In other words, we will do what we have been besieged to do by the inventors and patent attorneys. We will give them more help and better, for which they pay. Now, they have talked about paying for a long time, and I think they are willing to pay for it, and I think they ought to be required to pay for it when they are willing to pay for it. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply interested in the passage of the pending measure. During the early discussion of the bill the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made mention of the dire threats hurled against the Members of this House from labor and other unions throughout the United States, lodged complaints against them, rejoiced because of the splendid company in which he finds himself, and yet in the same breath hurls threats at those of us who are not in sympathy with his proposition to work for economy with a big "E." Let me say that the Republicans of this House desire to economize in every possible manner, but it will hardly be said that every reduction in appropriations results in economy. I am in receipt of numerous requests for the passage of the bill now under consideration, one being from a gentleman in whom I have great confidence, one who holds his position by reason of his acknowledged ability, and upon whose judgment great dependence can safely be placed. I make bold to say that lawyers in general are not capable of preparing proper specifications necessary to support an application for a patent, and therefore it is that inventors are required to enlist the services of experts in that line of work, and hence it is that the department should have in its employ men who are equally skilled in order that full justice may be done. Under the present rate of salaries capable men can not be retained in the service of the Government, but the passage of the pending measure will go very far toward securing the class of employees so urgently needed. I ask to read in my time a letter received from Mr. George E. Thackray, special engineer, in the employ of the Midvale Steel Co. at Johnstown, Pa. It is as follows:

CAMBRIA STEEL CO.,
Johnstown, Pa., July 29, 1919.

Hon. JOHN M. ROSE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call your respectful attention to House of Representatives bill No. 5011, to establish a patent and trade-mark office independent of any other department, etc., and Senate bill No. 818, to establish a United States court of patent appeals, etc., and to supplementary bill, the number of which I do not have, which has been introduced for the purpose of increasing the salaries in the Patent Office and adding to the forces thereof, all of which, in my opinion, are needed.

Under present conditions it is practically impossible to do business with the Patent Office owing to the fact that they are short of help because the pay is too small and the technical assistants will not stay with them, besides which the appropriations for printing copies of patents have been exhausted and no copies can be had, resulting in interminable delays and expense in our investigations and studies.

You can see from the reports of the Commissioner of Patents that they have almost invariably produced a surplus for the Government from the year 1837 to the present time and for the last few years this has been over $200,000 a year and in certain prior exceptional years the surplus was as large as $471,000.

A large part of the business and industrial development of this country is based upon patents under constitutional provision and amendments and most of the countries of the world have adopted a patent system similar to that of the United States, as they fully appreciate the advantages of same.

Under these conditions this branch of the Government should have full support, and anything that you can do toward this end will be appreciated.

Yours, very truly,
GEO. E. THACKRAY,
Special Engineer.

Now, in my opinion, the foregoing comments, coming from a highly skilled and technical engineer, should have more than ordinary weight in this body, especially with those of us who are not familiar with the work of the Patent Office, and bring us to the conclusion that it is our duty to stand by the committee having this legislation in charge and provide the Patent Office with the class of employees of which it stands in need.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, so far as I know, there is no objection on the part of the committee.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be read.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know much about the patent laws. Does anybody know how many patents are applied for each year?

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman wants the exact figures of last year, I will give them to him. During the year 1919 there were 76,484 applications, and there were 36,680 patents granted. During the year 1918 there were 57,180 applications and 38,000 patents granted.

Mr. CANNON. And what is the fee that is paid if the patent is finally granted? Fifteen dollars?

Mr. NOLAN. The final fee under the present law is $20. The filing fee is $15, but under this bill it is increased to $20, and the final fee remains at $20.

Mr. CANNON. What is the fee of the patent attorney?

Mr. NOLAN. We make no attempt to regulate the fees of the patent attorneys. We do make some attempt in this bill to put them under the control of the Commissioner of Patents, so that he can stop any improper practices.

Mr. CANNON. The bill is a good one, and I hope it may protect people scattered all over the country who are ignorant of the patent laws and who have not the money to employ a patent lawyer, but who finally get the money together to employ one, friends frequently assisting them in trying to obtain a patent.

I just want to tell an incident that happened when I was a boy. In the year 1855 there was a long, gangling fellow, as tall as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] but not so heavy, who learned the carpenter's trade. He was a wonderful young fellow, and he finally took contracts to build houses himself, at which he was fairly successful after he got started. But before that he had been working at a dollar a day. He invented an adding machine. I was a boy of all work in a little country shop, before the day of railroads, out in that country. I said, "John, bring the machine to me. I want to see if it can add. I gave him a list of figures, and it added them all right. The machine was that high [indicating]. It had been constructed by him, and no other adding machine existed up to that time. I said, "That ought to make you a fortune." He said that he had had some correspondence about it, but that he had to get $25 saved up before he could make his application. It ran along and ran along, and finally the war broke out, and he went into the Army and became a lieutenant colonel before he was discharged. After he had gotten out and could have employed an attorney, he found that somebody else, some smart young fellow or old fellow, had gotten a patent on the device.

I am under the impression from the number of letters that I get from old men, middle-aged men, and young men, that if there was some way to have patent attorneys who would be fair and square, much money might be saved to people who are not able to afford the expense. I do not know that the gentleman has any suggestion to make along that line, and I do not know that my suggestion is worth anything. You say that the Commissioner of Patents is to watch the attorneys who merely want to get the money without regard to whether the patent is worth a snap or not?

Mr. NOLAN. We are giving greater power to the Commissioner of Patents to admit men who are all right or disbar men who are guilty of improper practices.

Mr. CANNON. In order to become a patent attorney does a man have to go through an examination? Does he have to establish good character and all that kind of thing? Attorneys who practice law have to do that.

Mr. NOLAN. To the satisfaction of the Patent Commissioner.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking a question. I observe that the fee for copies of record made by the Patent Office is 10 cents per hundred words, excluding printed copies. Is there any fee fixed by statute for printed copies?

Mr. NOLAN. Ten cents a copy. It was formerly 5 cents, but the deficiency bill made it 10 cents, which brings an additional revenue of $150,000 a year.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I have had complaint that that fee was excessive. Has the committee considered that in connection with the bill?

Mr. NOLAN. We did; and there was not any complaint from any one of the scores of people who appeared before our committee against the 10-cent fee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. Is this the measure that has been denominated by some of the various patent attorneys in large industries of the country as the "Nolan life-saving Patent Office bill"?

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman, it is, but he will have to go to those gentlemen to find out why they so named it. I do not know, except it will save the life of the Patent Office.

Mr. WALSH. I was wondering if this was the measure, because I have received several hundred communications from a great many different people, and they have all referred to this measure as the "Nolan life-saving Patent Office bill." Now, I think it may be very well named. The gentleman says he did not give it that name. I will further state that all these communications were in favor of the measure, and a great many of them pointed out that, while it might increase the cost of doing business with the Patent Office, these people who evinced their approval raised no objection to that. Can the gentleman explain to me how this measure came to receive that appellation?

Mr. NOLAN. I can not, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, this is just one more instance of passing the increase in salaries "on to the Joneses." We have in this bill raised the present salaries in the Patent Office alone $511,000, and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE] and my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] seem to think it is all right, because they say it does not come out of anybody but the people who get patents; and they say that these people want to pay these extra fees—this extra $511,000. It is all paid by the people of the United States after all. Have these gentlemen not lived long enough and had business experience enough to know that there is not a family in the whole United States that does not every day pay the expense in some way of patents that have been issued?

Why, the most insignificant article of household use in the gentleman's State of New York, in the rural districts, and in the other gentleman's State of Pennsylvania, has added to its price, which the people pay, the expense, all the expense, of getting the patent as well as the expense of manufacturing it. It is just another case of passing the increased expense on to the people. The coal-mine operators increase the wages of their miners and add that increase to the price of coal and thus pass it on to the people. Railroad expenses are increased in raised salaries and passed on in higher railroad rates to the people. The wages in shoe, hat, and clothing factories are increased and passed on to the people in the articles they buy. Farm utensils and household furnishings come higher because wages are raised. It is another case of passing it on to the 110,000,000 people of this country.

Gentlemen talk about it being impossible to get patents. I had one of my constituents come up here not so very long ago, and I referred him to a patent attorney, and he promptly got a patent on a farm tractor, and his farm tractor is on the farms to-day, helping to plow up the lands in Texas. Not so very long ago one of my constituents came up here and wanted to get a patent on a portable hotel. I referred him to a patent attorney, and he went down here to the Patent Office and got his patent, and he is now building his portable hotels all over the country. This is all poppy-cock, this talk about it taking years and years to get a patent.

God knows what is to become of us; I do not know what will become of us if we do not turn around and go back the other way some time. What is it that is going to cause the great steering committee of this House to stop the extravagance of our Nation? What is going to stop it? I do not know. Sometimes I wish I had here, just for a short time, an old negro parson down South, who once prayed for Sam Jones when he once preached to a negro congregation down there at a negro meeting. Just before Rev. Jones got up the old negro parson said, "Brother Jones, before you begins this discourse, there are some powerful bad negroes in this here congregation, and I wants to pray for you." Rev. Jones said, "Go ahead." And this is what the old negro parson prayed:

"O Lord, give Brother Jones the eye of the eagle, that he may see sin from afar. Glue his ear to the gospel telephone, and connect him with the central skies. Illuminate his brow with a brightness that will make the fires of hell look like a tallow candle. Nail his hands to the gospel plow, and bow his head in some lonesome valley where prayer is much wanted to be said, and anoint him all over with the kerosene oil of Thy salvation and sot him afire."

It will take a negro prayer like that to wake up this Republican steering committee on the question of economy. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I took five minutes a little while ago, and I guess I had better not have taken it. Sometimes real inventors lose money that they are not able to lose, and I confess I do not know how that is to be avoided.

I listened with great interest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. He is always interesting; sometimes uncomfortably. I date back to the sickle that you cut wheat with. Fancy everybody cutting wheat with a sickle. I date back when the wheat was thrown on the ground or on the wood floor and the horses were turned in to trample it out. It was a winter's job for the men who labored on wages. I recollect very well when the cradle came. It was a great improvement. Some fool got a patent on that. [Laughter.] Then I recollect when the McCormick reaper came, and the ground thrasher. It was an awfully dirty job—and I generally had that job to do—sitting right down in front of the thrasher, the machine that did the work, raking away the wheat and the chaff. Then came the improvements one after the other. I recollect very well when the farm hands in Penn Township got together and went to Sam Smith's blacksmith shop and got two sledges and in the nighttime broke the machinery of that ground thrasher. There have been patents and patents and patents. We have had all kinds of experiences.

Now, I am not going to wish anything bad to the gentleman from Texas, but human effort and intelligence have done great things, and have been stimulated, of course, from the selfish standpoint, as they investigated and got the patents. I suspect that has been the case down in the gentleman's country, where the oil is stored and where, from the advertisements that I get, there are more fortunes than you can shake a stick at to be got from that great natural wealth. Well, old, wicked John D. Rockefeller started. I saw a kerosene lamp when I was a boy, at law school in Cincinnati. It made a wonderful light. It was a great improvement on the tallow dip, with the little strip of cotton, and the lard-oil lamp. Rockefeller went on. We are all cussing him from having too much money, notwithstanding he is giving a great deal of it away. But he was the pioneer. He set hundreds and thousands of chemists at work. And, bless my soul, gasoline would not have been in existence if it had not been for scientific investigation and all the machinery that has been invented to use the various kinds of by-products of oil, which, as well as the cattle and hogs, renders the gentleman's State of Texas a great State. It is one of the great industries. Oh, well, if the gentleman had had my experience he would not have made that speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in order to further develop this subject along the line brought out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]—the friend of Lincoln and the grand old man of the House—as to the service that is rendered by this Patent Office in aid or assistance of the man who has an idea and wants to carry his invention to fruition, I want to crave your indulgence just for a little while. As a practicing lawyer I have never specialized in patent law, and whenever I had a client to come to me with a scheme for a revolving coal dump or an iceless refrigerator or a rotary engine I would usually refer him to some patent lawyer at Washington.

In order to develop this matter and put it into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the people of this country may know something about the workings of this department, I want to ask two or three questions.

Mr. Chairman, can you tell us whether or not it is necessary to employ a patent lawyer in order to patent an idea?

Mr. NOLAN. It is not necessary at all. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. You have answered my question.

Mr. NOLAN. The fact of the matter is that there is no standard of requirement for a man to be admitted to practice in the Patent Office, except the permission of the commissioner.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Does the Patent Office provide technical experts, or men who are capable of putting down in correct words a statement of the essential facts upon which a patent may be predicated, without any special fee being paid by the applicant?

Mr. NOLAN. No; but they furnish blanks that any intelligent man can fill out and forward to the Patent Office, and if amendments are needed, these blanks are sent back, with certain specifications, to be amended. A general practice has grown up, however, in this as in all other lines where specialists are needed, of employing patent lawyers, who are in most instances men skilled in a technical way as well as in patent law.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. My judgment is that the Patent Office should have a force sufficient in numbers and intelligence to handle all applications for patents without the necessity of paid lawyers or counselors.

I want this great department of a great Government to reach out a friendly hand and say a kind word of greeting and encouragement to every inventor. Let the department do the work without the intervention of lawyers.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Is it not a fact, however, as a practical matter, that it is almost necessary to retain a patent lawyer in order to obtain a patent or a copyright?

Mr. NOLAN. In order to get action, yes; so that it is really in the interest of the inventor to retain a patent lawyer who will give him proper attention.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And get it immediately when he wants it.

Mr. NOLAN. Exactly, and we are trying in this bill to give more power to the Commissioner of Patents, so that he can better control those who are attempting to exploit inventors.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has used the words "in order to get action." Why will not this Patent Office force do the work without the necessity of compensating a lawyer to ding-dong them into action? The Patent Office deals with all sorts of people. It deals with men who have curious ideas, and with freaks, and all that, but it also deals with men who have judgment and who work persistently, continuously, everlastingly, and eternally upon an idea, and whenever such men bring forward the results of their mental operations and lay it before the Patent Office they are entitled to prompt action without having to employ a lawyer to be dinning into the ears of the proper officials the necessity of action. I have a constituent down in my country, a coal operator of many years' experience, who came there from the Pennsylvania fields years ago, who has gone through all of the vicissitudes that coal operators encounter. Through no fault of his own, he has been bankrupted—his business has collapsed, broken down, and failed, but he is still active and energetic. A few days ago he wrote me a four-page letter setting forth that he has invented a new plan—an idea for mining coal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes additional.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman allow me to try to get a unanimous-consent agreement regarding time?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Certainly.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman want three minutes?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I forwarded to the Patent Office this four-page letter—I received it from my friend, Mr. J. A. Williams, of Matewan, W. Va.—and I am wondering whether it will be necessary for Mr. Williams to employ a lawyer in order to find out whether his idea is patentable or whether the considerable fees and emoluments that come to this department—the Patent Office—are sufficient to pay men to read that letter and to write Mr. Williams if he is entitled to a patent.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Has not the gentleman very frequently had to advise his constituent to employ another patent lawyer to find out what the first patent lawyer did? Has not that been the case with some of his constituents?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. My experience with the Patent Office as a practicing lawyer is very limited.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am speaking about these so-called patent lawyers. Of course, it is a fiction to talk about them as lawyers, but when you hire one, then you have to hire another one to find out what the first one did. That has been my experience. If this law will do anything to suppress the great horde of so-called patent lawyers who live off the people who think they have ideas, I am certainly for it, and I am for a commissioner with backbone enough to shut them out.

Mr. NOLAN. The trouble is that the gentleman does not distinguish between fakers and the reputable attorneys.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The gentleman from Arkansas has been in Congress for many years, and his experience is worthy of all consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg my friend's pardon for taking up his time.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to a remarkable feature of the argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I am wondering whether he would really like to have circulated in his district in juxtaposition the two speeches which he made on this floor to-day. First he most eloquently denounced the Republican side for trying to raise salaries. Then he got up and denounced us for trying to raise receipts in an amount more than sufficient to cover the increased salaries, and he says that the people will not stand for either one. Of course, we Republicans can hardly expect to please the gentleman from Texas, and we make no attempt to do so. Now, I made a rapid mental calculation about the effect on 110,000,000 people of raising the fee $5 for the issuance of a patent—raising it from $15 to $20. The chairman of the committee tells us that this will return to the Treasury of the United States $180,000. Divided among 110,000,000 people it would amount to about 1.6 mills per individual in this country, and I really do not think the people in my district are going to telegraph the gentleman from Texas protesting about my having helped to levy an assessment on them of less than 2 mills per individual.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, this patent bill reminds me that one of the most useful inventions we have had during the last few years, particularly in case of motor cars, has been a self-starter, and when I hear the gentleman from Texas day after day in the House shouting that our economy is mere lip economy I wish to God, as he does so often, that somebody would invent and present to him a self-stopper. [Laughter.]

He seeks publicity, and no doubt he gets it. He is constantly reiterating his attitude on economy, and he makes me think of the old man up in my country who hung out a sign as a physician. Somebody inquired as to his qualifications. He did not have any diploma, but he said he was down in the Indian country and some Indian gave him some medicine that would throw a man into fits, and an old medicine man gave him something that would cure fits, and so he said "When I am called to see a sick man I give him some medicine that will throw him into fits, and then I am all hell on curing fits." [Laughter.]

Now, I would take more stock in the gentleman from Texas if I thought he was sincere, and while there is evidence here——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I make the point of order against the gentleman questioning my sincerity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. CROWTHER. I understood by the press the other day that the statement——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, did the Chair rule on my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that the gentleman from New York must proceed in order.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I notice that a good deal of money he has been crying about has leaked into his office. He has received his pay, and he did not find any great fault about it. It reminds me of a story of a fellow up my way——

Mr. BLANTON. What does the gentleman mean by leaked?

Mr. CROWTHER. In the natural course as salary checks, and so forth.

Mr. BLANTON. What money?

Mr. CROWTHER. Money from the United States Treasury that the gentleman claims is wasted; he has got his share of it in his office in expenses, salaries, and so forth. Mr. Chairman, I hope these interruptions will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the genius of an inventive character is not always rewarded by a patent. During the war our Navy laid a mine barrage across the North Sea. After the war they were directed to remove it. They found that they could pick up the mines which were sunk deep in the water if they had proper vessels and tools with which to handle them. But they knew that if they used steel vessels under the ordinary conditions and that steel vessel came in contact with a mine it would be the vessel that would be destroyed as well as the mine. A wooden vessel would be comparatively safe, and when the Navy first commenced its work it started in with some small wooden fishing vessels connected so that the two vessels could move ahead, at some distance apart, with a wire cable between, which would pick up the mine. But it would have been impossible in a long period of time to have removed this mine barrage by the aid of these small wooden vessels. We did not have a sufficient number of wooden vessels to handle the situation. The Navy Department and the commander in chief of the Navy over there were up against it. They did not know what to do. They were afraid to use the steel vessels.

One day a little ensign, new in the Navy, knocked timidly on the door of the admiral, commander in chief, and was admitted by his secretary or aid and asked what he wanted. He said, after saluting, "Sir, I think I have a suggestion which may be of service to you." Then he made a simple suggestion which gave to the Navy, it having followed his proposition and plan, the ability to use the big steel vessels of the Navy in removing this mine barrage and accomplished the purpose which could not have been accomplished without it. A brighter suggestion was never made. I do not know the name of the ensign, but no man who ever received a patent conferred a greater benefit on his country, temporarily at least, than this little, modest ensign who made the suggestion that enabled those steel vessels to be used under the theory of electric contact.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that was a pro forma amendment, and I ask to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think the Committee on Patents should be commended for the consideration that they have given to this piece of legislation. From such correspondence as I have had with various parties interested in my city, the opinion seems to be practically unanimous in favor of the legislation.

I desire at this time, however, to call the attention of the Members to something somewhat aside from the legislation we have been considering. We have in this city the headquarters of an organization called the National Popular Government League. They have an executive secretary named Judson King. Last summer and fall, when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was working night and day endeavoring to perfect adequate legislation to take care of the transportation question, this organization, with Judson King as secretary, sent out circular mail to various constituents of mine soliciting funds for its support and making false statements in reference to the committee and its members. They impugned the honesty of the members of the committee in conducting their hearings, and falsely stated the position of the committee and the evidence that was being considered by it. This morning as I was in my office the regular House employee who delivers the mail brought to me in a tied package the mail of the hour, and in the package was a letter marked from the National Popular Government League, Munsey Building, Washington, D. C. It bore no stamp whatever, and no postage had ever been paid upon it. I wondered at it. I called up the House Postmaster and was informed by him that it was the custom to distribute letters left at the post office there, even though no postage had been paid thereon, providing the request to distribute was made by a Member of the House, and that such a request had been made in this instance. I can see the reason for a custom permitting a Member, with respect to nonfrankable matters, signed or marked by himself, which he desires sent to his colleagues, to have it brought to the House post office and there distributed in accordance with the custom, but I can conceive of no reason why outside matter, coming from an entirely outside source, should be brought to the House post office and there distributed without the customary 1-cent postage, simply because some Member of the House who does not sign his name to it requests that it be done. Why should they not pay postage? It seems to me that above everything else it should be denied to an organization that has made it its business during the past three or four months, while the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have been working night and day upon the railroad legislation, to send throughout the length and breadth of the land false statements in reference to that committee and to impugn its motives. I hope never again to have delivered in my mail in that manner any message whatever from any such organization as that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman consider that the House post office is a post office which cancels stamps?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not know.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It does not. It is not a post office, and it does not cancel stamps, and as a matter of courtesy, if the gentleman deposits mail in the post office for me it will be delivered to me. That is what it is for. If mail is deposited there by anybody, and a Member of Congress requests that it be distributed by the postmaster, it is distributed and delivered. Whether that ought to have been done in this instance is another thing, but the House postmaster can not determine the character of the mail which he handles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I admit all of that, but the point is that when a Member requests any literature of that kind distributed, before the courtesy is extended to that literature, the signature of some Member or some mark of the Member should be attached to it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I do not think so, if the gentleman will permit. For instance, we send invitations frequently through the House post office to Members of Congress, and no name is attached to those upon the outside, and I can see no reason why there should be.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I submit that to an organization which makes false statements about a committee of Congress and impugns the motives of its Members the courtesy should be denied.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whether the Member ought to do it is, of course, another thing.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 8, line 21, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 21, after the word "evidence," insert "and all other evidence in the record."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it was suggested that the court might, in his consideration, restrict the evidence immediately referred to, which was not intended, and in order to obviate any possibility of that kind through an abundance of caution this amendment is offered with the approval of all of the members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from California a question. I observe in the report that this legislation is the committee substitute for the bills H. R. 5011, 5012, and 7010. May we consider now that the Committee on Patents has concluded its consideration of those respective bills, and that for present purposes, at least, the work of the committee has been completed upon this legislation?

Mr. NOLAN. I would not say that it is completed, but, as a matter of expediency, on account of the importance of this reorganization and of other legislation, the committee decided to set aside for the present the matter of a court of patent appeals. That is all that has been set aside, outside of making the Patent Office an independent department of the Government, which the committee does not consider we ought to do at any time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Well, those are the two bills—5011 and 5012—so that this matter of a court of patent appeals may have further consideration?

Mr. NOLAN. It may. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11984) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit this bill to the Committee on Patents, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendments, to wit: On page 1, line 7, strike out "$6,000" and insert "$5,500"; in line 8, strike out "$5,500" and insert "$4,800"; in line 11, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,000"; and on page 2, in line 1, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,000"; in line 7, strike out the two sums of "$4,000" and insert in lieu of each thereof "$3,500"; in line 8, strike out "$4,200" and insert "$3,700"; in line 9, strike out "$3,900" and insert "$3,300"; in line 10, strike out "$3,900" and insert "$3,300"; in line 11, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,600"; in line 12, strike out "$2,700" and insert "$2,300"; in line 12, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,000"; in line 13, strike out "$2,200" and insert "$1,800"; in line 14, strike out "$2,050" and insert "$1,850"; in line 15, strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,600"; in line 15, strike out "$1,650" and insert "$1,500"; in line 16, strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,400"; in line 17, strike out "$3,900" and insert "$3,300"; in line 18, strike out "$3,300" and insert "$2,800"; in line 18, strike out "$3,100" and insert "$2,600"; in line 19, strike out "$2,900" and insert "$2,500"; in line 20, strike out "$2,800" and insert "$2,250"; in line 20, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,000"; in line 21, strike out "$2,350" and insert "$1,800"; in line 21, strike out "$2,200" and insert "$1,600"; in line 22, strike out "$2,050" and insert "$1,500"; in line 22, strike out "$1,925" and insert "$1,400"; in line 23, strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,400"; in line 24, strike out "$1,650" and insert "$1,350"; in line 24, strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,300"; and on page 3, in line 2, strike out "$2,700" and insert "$2,500"; in line 3, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,200"; in line 4, strike out "$2,100" and insert "$1,750"; in line 6, strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,250"; in line 8, strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,600"; in line 9, strike out "$1,600" and insert "$1,500"; in line 9, strike out "$1,400" and insert "$1,300"; in line 11, strike out "$1,100" and insert "$1,000"; in line 13, strike out "$1,100" and insert "$1,000"; in line 13, strike out "thirty-six" and insert "six"; and in line 14, strike out the two sums of "$1,080" and insert in lieu of each of such sums "$800."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 6, nays 272, not voting 149, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. NOLAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 483.

Resolved, That on Saturday, the 6th day of March, 1920, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock a. m. That immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business upon the Speaker's table the House shall automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Report No. 637, from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. That there shall be four hours allowed for debate upon said report, one-half to be controlled by the chairman of said committee and one-half by the gentleman from California, Mr. LEA. That the following members of said committee, Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin, Mr. MAGEE, of New York, and Mr. LEA of California, shall have leave to extend and revise such remarks as they may, respectively, make upon said report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without further leave of the House. That upon the conclusion of said debate the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall automatically rise.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution clearly states its purpose.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, can we not have an agreement as to the time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I was going to yield half an hour to the gentleman.

Mr. POU. Can we not under unanimous consent have an agreement that half of the time shall be controlled by the gentleman and one-half by myself?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the hour be divided equally between the gentleman from North Carolina and myself?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can yield such time as he pleases.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question before the gentlemen begin.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Whoever suggested to the Rules Committee, a great, dignified committee, to undertake to fix the privilege of a Member as to extending his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Many times the Rules Committee has done that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It has never been done.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. During the administration of Speaker CLARK many times the committee gave everybody the right to extend.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Whenever has it selected some particular Members?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The general thing includes the other. This is a right to the gentlemen who speak to extend their remarks.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We were specific in this case not to give the right to extend remarks in the RECORD to those who had not spoken on the subject on the floor. In this case the gentlemen are to have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD who make addresses on the floor during the day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask if this is intended to be a future as well as a present rule? It never has been done before, and it never ought to be done now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Committee on Rules usually does what it thinks expedient at the moment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this rule mean that nobody else shall speak except these three men and nobody else extend their remarks?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The reading of the rule, I think, is very clear.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the way the rule reads, I think.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the chairman will construe the rule fairly.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] to use his time.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Do I understand now that this rule in substance does this, that Messrs. LEA, MAGEE, and FREAR are to talk a certain given time, and have only the right to extend their remarks, and that gentlemen on both sides of the House can talk under permission from these gentlemen but can not extend their remarks, though they do talk?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not sure that these gentlemen would yield their time, but it is always possible for the House, by unanimous consent, to do what it desires.

Mr. DONOVAN. They will control the four hours?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. These gentleman will control the four hours.

Mr. DONOVAN. And if they do not see fit to yield any time, nobody will have an opportunity to speak, because there will be no extension of remarks.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true.

Mr. DONOVAN. People only have the right to extend their remarks in case they do yield to them?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not in case they do yield.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then, they have the usual right under unanimous consent?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Under this rule, as I understand it, no single Member can, by interposing an objection, prevent the three men whose names are mentioned in the rule from correcting and extending their remarks?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was on his feet.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks on the Spanish-American War pension bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask the gentleman if these great speeches have already been handed to the press?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman will have to ask the gentlemen themselves. I have no doubt the gentleman from Texas will be able to get the information from them.

Mr. KINCHELOE. There is no inhibition in the rule against Members being allowed to vote on this eventually? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am asking the gentleman from Kansas whether we shall have the right to vote on this eventually under the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, yes; in a very short time I shall move the previous question.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Do it now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to extend my remarks on the Spanish War pension act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the Spanish War pension act. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be notified at the end of 12 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, for the present I shall not yield to any interruptions or questions.

It is not surprising that the House received this resolution with a titter of ridicule when it was read. That same titter of ridicule was apparent when the Committee on Rules, in responding, evidently to orders from higher up, did what they knew to be a silly thing in reporting to the House of Representatives the resolution now under consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the responsibility might as well be fixed. I absolve the majority of the members of the Committee on Rules from ever doing voluntarily a silly thing. The steering committee—the Republican steering committee of the House—is responsible for this asinine performance. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You might as well call a spade "a spade," and that is what I am going to do for a few minutes. There is nothing personal in this. I have served here too long to entertain any personal feeling about anything. But, gentlemen, as long as the House of Representatives does such idiotic things as this you need not be surprised if the man on the street laughs when you mention the American House of Representatives.

I have wondered why it was that the people of America will not take the House of Representatives seriously. I have wondered why it is so many of the people who send us here throw off the House of Representatives when we go back home. Such things as this are largely responsible for the unenviable opinion of the House entertained by so many men.

Here is this great body of representative men, 435 men, absolutely dominated by seven men. I am going to put the roll of honor in the RECORD. These compose the Republican steering committee: The chairman of the steering committee, the gentleman from Wyoming, Mr. MONDELL; Mr. LONGWORTH; Mr. MADDEN; Mr. DUNN, of New York; Mr. WINSLOW, of Massachusetts; Mr. DARROW; and, ex officio, our genial friend, the Speaker. If I have made a mistake as to the membership of the committee I am very willing to be corrected. Four of these men constitute a majority; therefore, the result is that four men are running this House. The three States of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania absolutely control the great Republican majority here, and therefore the fate of all legislation. Let us fix the responsibility. Surely no one will object.

Now, you have some big men on your side. You have a number of high-minded, clean-cut statesmen. Do not you men feel a little bit cheap to find yourselves in this position? You must take orders from these four men. That is what the Rules Committee is doing right now. And to think about the way they framed this steering committee! See whom they left off. There is a gentleman on the Republican side of the House who has an international reputation as parliamentarian. I do not believe there is a better parliamentarian in the world than JAMES R. MANN or a more conscientious legislator. [Applause.] He was not put on this Republican steering committee. Why? Was it because he would not agree to play the game as the bosses demanded? You have that noblest old Roman of them all, the ex-Speaker of this House, Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, who during more than a generation has made an honorable career here, vigorous, broad, clean, big-minded. He also must be left off. You could not make up a steering committee certainly without thinking of him as a logical member.

But he was left off. Was that because you were afraid you could not use him? He is still vigorous and attends to his duties as faithfully as the youngest Member. I wish he were present. I am sure I echo the sincere wish of every Member of this House when I say of him as Webster said of Lafayette:

> Illustrious as your virtues are, honorable as your long career has been, far, oh, very far distant be the day when any monument shall bear your inscription or tongue pronounce your eulogy.

[Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, must we do this thing? Must we spend the whole of to-morrow in discussing a report of this committee intended solely for campaign consumption? That is the whole purpose of this performance. There will be nothing before the House. No vote will be taken on anything. There will be talk and talk, and the House will automatically rise after four hours of talk. Do you imagine the people who sent you here will approve? These several political investigating subcommittees have traveled in two hemispheres trying to dig up something discreditable to Woodrow Wilson's administration and up to this good hour you have not put your finger on any scandal. If so, point it out. Tell us where it is. Why, you can hardly get the newspapers of the country to pay any attention to your activities for a single issue. You sent a committee to France. One gentleman sent a telegram from Paris that the war had not been fought exactly right. We expected he would tell all about it when he got back. Then when the committee got back to New York another gentleman gave out an interview, indicating the country would hear something later on. You sent another committee into the Northwest. You have had them digging night and day all over this country, and as I said right here when you created these committees, the result of it all is the full and complete vindication of this administration and the men who had control of the conduct of the war. I challenge you here and now to put your finger on any scandal that touches Mr. Wilson's administration. We have heard more than once that you were just on the eve of discovering something. More than once the intimation has been thrown out that you have discovered a lead and that the country may expect something within the next few days.

Barring the necessary extravagance in a great undertaking like the World War, there never has been since the dawn of time a war conducted where those in power and charged with the responsibility were so free from scandal as the men under Woodrow Wilson who have conducted this Great War. [Applause.] It would seem you would be willing to stop in attempting to discover something that would help the Republican Party politically, but oh, no; you do not stop there. Mr. Speaker, I have been amazed at the venom, the spleen, and the hate displayed toward this great man in the White House, whose name will be a household word when all who are trying to discredit him will have sunk forever into oblivion. [Applause.] A thousand years after the man who laughed at that remark is forgotten the name of Woodrow Wilson will be mentioned in every civilized home as the man who in his generation did most for mankind.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it would seem that men go far enough when they attack merely from a political purpose, but the hate of some men is so great they appear to be willing to injure character in order to bring the Republican Party back into power. There appears to be somebody always ready to do what is necessary to ruin the character of any man who has risen to prominence under Wilson's administration. Thank God, every such effort has failed, as all such efforts will continue to fail. We had the evidence of it here yesterday when you pulled off another fool performance in a puny, sickly effort to damage the character of the Attorney General. I do not believe there are five men in this House who will say upon their honor that they believe the Attorney General has done anything discreditable. I for one did not believe the Rules Committee considered the resolution seriously. The Attorney General merely said men would not be prosecuted for profiteering if they held down the price of sugar to a certain point. Every intelligent man knew that was and is all he has done, but a resolution intended to injure him must be passed, anyway.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say in conclusion that the people of America love fair play. No political party is going to ride into power by pursuing a policy of unfair treatment to the other party. [Applause.] I appeal to that spirit of fairness, of generosity, of chivalric consideration for a political opponent that I know exists in the hearts and minds of so many men on the Republican side of this Chamber when I say we have had enough of this fool performance. For God's sake, let us stop here and now. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use the remainder of his time? There will be only one more speech on this side.

Mr. POU. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] the remainder of my time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 19 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I think this rule needs some explanation in addition to that which has been given by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and even in addition to that given by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

This is a rule to provide that the House do nothing to-morrow and meet at 11 o'clock to begin it. [Laughter.]

The reason for its passage this afternoon is that for some reason it became necessary a few days ago for the "powers that be" in the House to make public the statement that to-morrow this report of the War Expenditures Committee would be turned loose upon the House for discussion, and it was known that if they should wait for to-morrow to present the rule, the Members being forewarned, there would not probably be a quorum here to pass it.

It is an excellent rule!

It provides that the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. For what? There is no bill to be considered. The report in itself does not carry any charge on the Treasury, though the Lord knows getting it up has carried enough. It is to be considered, not in the House but in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Of course, it takes only 100 to make a quorum in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

However, it has one good provision. It says that upon the conclusion of the debate the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall automatically rise! When the debate is ended, in other words, you will not have to sit here, but the committee can rise, and the House can adjourn, and gentlemen can go their way.

If it had not been for that provision, God knows what a condition we might have been in at the conclusion of this general debate! [Laughter.]

I am very much pleased that my distinguished colleague from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has acquitted my associates of the majority on the Rules Committee from all responsibility for the form and even the passage of this rule, save only as they were willing to act as the vicarious atonement for the folly of the steering committee.

Mr. Speaker, of course we understand what the purpose of the discussion to-morrow is. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], after many months of travail, has prepared a report upon aviation.

While the war was in progress, when the unsatisfactory conditions with regard to the aviation situation arose, the President of the United States called upon a distinguished gentleman, a former justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Republican Party's nominee for the Presidency in 1916, and asked him to investigate the aviation situation. He did it; and there is not a man, woman, or child in America or in the world, who knows aught of Mr. Hughes, who does not know that he absolutely exhausted that subject, and that every fact touching that program was disclosed to the public of the country and of the world. This Committee on Expenditures was organized. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] was appointed as a member of it, and was made the chairman of the subcommittee on aviation. One of his first demands, under a threat to resign if it was not granted, was that he be permitted to employ a lawyer to review the findings and decisions of Mr. Justice Hughes, formerly of the Supreme Court of the United States. That consent was given. These many months have been spent in this investigation, and absolutely nothing is presented here that was not presented by Mr. Justice Hughes, save such things, of course, as have occurred since the time Mr. Justice Hughes concluded his investigation. But the purpose of this rule is to enable gentlemen to once again attack the Secretary of War and the President of the United States. Periodically we must have that, it appears.

Somehow, some way, the Republican Party seems unwilling to forgive a Democratic administration for conducting the most successful war in the history of the world [applause on the Democratic side], and persists in attempting to talk about the inefficiency of the Secretary of War.

If the Secretary of War had been one-half as inefficient in making war as the Republican Party has been in making peace, the boys of America would still be dying on the fields of France. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the spirit of vengeance must be served and the opportunity must be given, and therefore we are to have it for four hours to-morrow. It has been passed down from the steering committee out of the mystic room. When one considers the intelligence that is possessed by the individual members of the Republican steering committee, successful business men in the main, men of large experience in public affairs—when one thinks of the ability of these individuals, it is a puzzle, a marvel, a wonder as to the amount of idiocy which collectively they can thrust on this House of Representatives. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] So far as my observation extends, I freely declare the ability of every one of these gentlemen; but in all the experience and all the history of the country, for sheer ridiculousness in collective action, I am committed to the steering committee. And the peculiar part about it is that this committee makes every man on the Republican side dance. I am wondering how long they are to continue to dance to the music made by these gentlemen.

Having explained this rule [laughter], having given you to understand thoroughly what it is to provide for, viz, an opportunity for attacking the Secretary of War and the President of the United States, I have little else to say. Just why these two men should be attacked we do not know. There is no Republican who has ever told us. I suppose if one attempts to do so he can only say with Shylock:

> As there is no firm reason to be rendered,
> So can I give no reason, nor will I not,
> More than a lodged hate and a certain loathing
> I bear Antonio, that I follow thus
> A losing suit against him.

Now that the House understands the rule, now that it has been explained, I trust that it may meet with that solemn consideration and that serious disposition which its unintelligence demands. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I would take the remainder of my time in answering the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] if I were a humorist; but I am not. I have never attempted humor that I did not become ridiculous. My personal attachment to both of the gentlemen, however, leads me to wish for each of them that they may make their constituents laugh and applaud as they have made the Democratic side laugh and applaud when they speak of the blunders of the administration in connection with aviation. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is not my purpose to discuss the merits of the proposition. However, the House is entitled and the country is entitled to know from this committee that has been making the investigation of the matter what their conclusions are.

And it is for the purpose of enabling this committee that has seriously investigated the questions raised before the House and before the country that to-morrow is set aside for the discussion of that report.

Mr. Speaker, in order to get the matter immediately settled, I move he previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 116, not voting 164, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks which I made to-day on the patent bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEATH OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE J. M. GUDGER, JR.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, it is with a very deep feeling of regret that I announce the death of Hon. James M. Gudger at his home in Asheville, N. C. Mr. Gudger rendered most distinguished services as a Member of this House in the Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, Sixty-second, and Sixty-third Congresses. There are many here now who served with him and know his splendid character and ability. He was for many years one of the distinctive leaders in North Carolina. Due to his ability as a lawyer and splendid character as a man, he served his State in the senate of North Carolina and as a prosecuting officer in the courts. This led to his selection as the Representative from the tenth congressional district of North Carolina for four terms, and in that position his services were most conspicuous.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Saturday, March 6, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation for relocating the fence on the Fourteenth Street side of Auditors' Building (H. Doc. No. 671); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Bureau of Biological Survey to reimburse the appropriation, "General expenses, Bureau of Biological Survey, 1920," for expenses on account of shortage of elk feed on the winter elk refuge at Jackson Hole, Wyo. (H. Doc. No. 672); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter calling the attention of Congress to serious congested conditions existing in various public buildings throughout the country (H. Doc. No. 673); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill extending authority to order boards of medical examiners, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

ADDITIONAL PATENT OFFICE EMPLOYEES (S. DOC. NO. 245).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, as in legislative session, laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $39,700 required by the Patent Office for additional employees for the fiscal year 1920, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

TRAINING OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES (S. DOC. NO. 246).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 7, 1920, a report on the advisability of establishing a training school for Federal employees in the District of Columbia, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 11984. An act to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 305. Joint resolution to amend a certain paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 11756. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield, in Hampden County, Mass.;

H. R. 12160. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point a little east of north of Nocona, in Montague County, Tex.; and

S. J. Res. 156. A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KNOX. As in legislative session, I present a resolution adopted by the City Council of Philadelphia, Pa., which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table, as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, CITY COUNCIL,
Philadelphia, March 3, 1920.

Hon. PHILANDER C. KNOX,
United States Senator.

SIR: This is to certify that the following is a true and correct copy of the original resolution passed by the city council on the 2d day of March, 1920:

Resolution for the restoration of mail-tube service.

"Whereas the pneumatic tube service, which represents the beginning of this real practical reform, had its origin in this city under the inspiration of our first citizen, John Wanamaker, and has demonstrated its usefulness by more than 20 years' actual daily service to the satisfaction of its patrons and the public in general; and

"Whereas its arbitrary, indefensible abolition last year caused great hardship and inconvenience to all elements of our population, arousing a spirit of indignant protest, particularly throughout the business community, where the loss entailed is very severe: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the council of the city of Philadelphia, reiterating the position on this subject expressed again and again heretofore by our municipal government, requests the immediate restoration of the pneumatic mail tubes, as set forth in House bill No. 11634; and be it

"Resolved, That this body go on record as indorsing most emphatically House concurrent resolution No. 44, now before the Senate Post Office Committee, for the preservation of this property pending further congressional action in the matter; and be it also

"Resolved, That council favors the creation by Congress of a competent commission for the investigation of the whole question of mail transportation, especially in great cities, and of the Post Office Department as well."

Attest:

WM. H. FELTON,
Clerk of City Council.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted at a convention of veterans of the World War, held at Columbus, Kans., favoring legislation providing for a bonus for ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Photo-Engravers' Union No. 41, of Topeka, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Sterling-Graham sedition bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Overbrook, Elkhart, Beloit, Hardner, Little River, Abbeyville, and Oakhill, all in the State of Kansas, and of sundry citizens of Elk City, Okla.; Granger, Mo.; and Guide Rock, Nebr., remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4020) granting an increase of pension to Susan W. Allison; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 4021) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Cordell, Okla.;

A bill (S. 4022) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Elk City, Okla.; and

A bill (S. 4023) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Clinton, Okla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4024) to provide for the reimbursement of actual expenses to officers of the Army, contract surgeons, and dental surgeons when traveling on duty without troops within the Territory of Alaska; and

A bill (S. 4025) for the relief of disbursing officers of the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 4026) granting an increase of pension to James M. Millirons (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRONNA (for Mr. MCCUMBER):

A bill (S. 4027) to enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to simplify the regulations under which exported property is exempt from the transportation tax, and to prevent discrimination against agricultural and other commodities transported to a port or place of export to supply foreign requirements; to the Committee on Finance.

SHORT-TIME RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I give notice of an amendment which I intend to offer to the regular Agricultural appropriation bill. I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. —. That there is hereby constituted a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, to consist of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, and the chairmen of the Committees on Banking and Currency of the two Houses, and two other members of each of said committees, to be designated by the chairmen of the respective committees, and it shall be the duty of said joint committee to investigate and report at as early a date as may be as to the practicability of establishing a system of short-time rural credits in the United States and to recommend such legislation as may be deemed practicable and desirable to that end. The said committee is hereby authorized to hold meetings either during or between sessions.

The sum of $15,000 is hereby appropriated, the same to be immediately available, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray all necessary expenses of said joint committee, who shall be selected by the committee.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CUMMINS (Mr. GRONNA in the chair) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,800 for salary to Alanson D. Gaston, a Senate messenger, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $102,300 for investigations of the best methods of road making, especially ordinary sand-clay, clay, and dirt roads, and the best kind of road-making materials, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment providing that hereafter every day set aside by a State to be observed as a holiday therein in addition to the holidays now prescribed by law for the Postal Service shall be a holiday within the provisions of law for the employees of the Postal Service within such States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing for the repeal of the requirement in section 4 of the act of June 29, 1906, relative to the filing of a certificate of arrival from the Department of Labor with the clerk of the court at the time of the filing of petition for naturalization, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

POSSESSIONS OF GREECE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 324), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Northern Epirus (including Corytza), the Twelve Islands of the Ægean, and the western coast of Asia Minor, where a strong Greek population predominates, should be awarded by the peace conference to Greece and become incorporated in the Kingdom of Greece.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I now renew the request I made the other day for unanimous consent, and I am sure it will cause no discussion whatever. All the parties who are interested in the matter have agreed to it. I move that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3942) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces, and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. MCLEAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency has no disposition to escape any responsibility which properly belongs to it, neither has it any disposition to encroach upon the jurisdiction of other committees. This bill was referred to our committee and we began hearings upon it. It was soon suggested that the bill ought not to be considered by our committee, because it had nothing to do with banking and currency, and that a similar bill which was introduced in the House had been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The bill does involve a large issue of Government nontaxable bonds, and it was my view that it ought to go to the Committee on Finance of the Senate. The author of the bill is anxious to have it referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, and if it is believed that it should go there, it is immaterial to me, and I have no objection to the reference suggested by the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent to move, as in legislative session, that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 3942 and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to make a short reply. I am not going to object to the request of the Senator from Florida. As I stated before, I think the bill should go either to the Committee on Finance or to the Committee on Public Lands. The proper committee, in my opinion, is the Committee on Public Lands; but the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands claims that similar bills have been referred to the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee, and he desires to have this bill go to that committee. I have no objection to it whatever, but I think I ought to take this occasion to say that, as far as I am personally concerned, I can not support any kind of a proposition to exempt bonds for irrigation purposes or any other purpose from Federal taxation, and this bill involves that question.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is a matter for the committee and for the Senate to determine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none.

The Senator from Florida moves that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 3942 and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

MISS JULIA LATHROP'S TRIP TO EUROPE.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think it does not require very much courage on the part of Members of the Senate to attack on the floor people upon the outside, even when they attack men. I think it requires a less degree of courage when they attack women.

On yesterday the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who heretofore has been very careful about putting into the RECORD letters from people, placed in the RECORD a letter which was a covert attack, if not an open one, upon the head of the Children's Bureau, who is doing such good work for humanity. The Senator from Utah said:

I call attention to this—

That is, her trip to Czechoslovakia—

because I believe that all such junketing trips should cease.

Further he said:

I have been trying to find out from what appropriation the moneys are spent for this purpose, but so far I am uninformed.

It would have been better if the Senator had informed himself before making the attack on this lady. The facts should go in the RECORD. If there is no one else to speak for her, I will.

The Czecho-Slovak Republic asked the State Department to permit Miss Lathrop to come to that country and assist them in the problems affecting the children of that struggling new nation. She has done a great work in this country in the Children's Bureau, and instead of the Government paying any part of this expense she pays it out of her own pocket. The Acting Secretary of State requested the Secretary of Labor to excuse her from her work for a brief period, not exceeding, I think, 90 days.

Mr. President, I notice that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] also referred to the matter, and referred to this bureau as one which was to cost but $25,000 per annum. I have observed that generally when the Children's Bureau is here for appropriations there are certain Senators who have endeavored to cripple its work, though I do not find when they come to voting on questions of eradicating the boll weevil or studying the diseases of plants or eradicating the cattle tick that there is much said against such bureaus or such appropriations. I can not understand it. I know we are living in a reactionary age. I know that when some candidates for the Presidency now are asked to give their political views on questions they point with pride to the platforms of 1861 and 1865 and 1869 for their views, and I know among that kind of politicians there is a tendency to regard such institutions as the Children's Bureau as a joke and work for humanity as a farce. I suppose that opposition to the bureau is the reason for this attack upon Miss Lathrop.

I join with those who are against junketing trips, but when a woman, devoted to the cause of humanity, who is giving her life to help little struggling children, is called upon to go to another country for the benefit of their poor, little, starving, underfed children, at the request of that nation, and to try to help build them up and help that nation in the problem of caring for its children, I think it is beyond the proprieties that such a woman should be attacked on this floor, even covertly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that I have made no attack upon Miss Lathrop.

Mr. KENYON. What was the letter put in the RECORD for?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait a moment, I will tell him.

Mr. KENYON. I will wait.

Mr. SMOOT. I received a letter from a Government employee and I quoted from that letter. The Senator will find it in the RECORD. Among other things stated in the letter, the writer said:

It is about time that such junkets were halted.

I also read into the RECORD the announcement made in the Washington Post of March 3.

I wish to say to the Senator that from the information I have the trip of Miss Lathrop is a junketing trip, and I thought it was nothing more than right to express my disapproval of junkets in general, and that they should cease. The Senator from Iowa knows that the Government of the United States has been paying money time and time again for junketing trips to Europe, and will continue to do so unless a stop is put to it by Congress; and I care not what may be said of me because of my opposition to all of them.

If Miss Lathrop is paying her own expenses and the writer was mistaken, well and good; I have not a word to say if she can be spared from her work in this country. If I can do anything in the future to stop this practice by calling the attention of the Senate and of the country to junketing trips, I am going to do it, irrespective of whether it pleases any Senator or whether it pleases any favored employee of the Government.

I am greatly delighted to hear the Senator make the explanation that Miss Lathrop is not going abroad at the expense of the Government. My information was otherwise. If the Senator desires to see the letter from which I quoted, I am perfectly willing to show it to him. Miss Lathrop is employed to look after the welfare of American children, and I am in favor of such work.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has referred to a question which I asked the Senator from Utah when he was making his statement on yesterday. I think I have been for 18 years consistently opposed to the establishment of new bureaus and new departments. I have taken that position in the interest of the economical administration of the affairs of the Government. I have contended that the Children's Bureau might be carried on and that its good work might be conducted without the establishment of a new bureau. It was originally stated on the floor here that the establishment of this bureau would not cost to exceed $25,000 per annum. I then contended that it would cost much more, and it is now costing the Government over $400,000 a year, taking the course of all other similar bureaus after their establishment. The Senator from Iowa has always stood here with me in the interest of economy.

In asking the question of the Senator from Utah I merely desired to illustrate my idea, that when such bureaus are established, although it is stated upon the floor of the Senate that they will cost but little money, they invariably cost about one hundred times more than it is contended in the first instance that they will cost. I repeat it was stated on the floor that the Children's Bureau would not cost to exceed $25,000 per annum, and yet we are now appropriating nearly $400,000 annually for its expenses. I merely wished to show that I was right in my contention that it would cost over $25,000.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think the Senator means to state that I stood with him in his fight against the appropriation for the Children's Bureau.

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. KENYON. I never thought it was proper economy to economize on little children.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Iowa, I am aware, is very much interested in this matter, but I contended that the work could be done in the department then existing rather than establishing a new bureau; that was my idea in the first instance, and I believe now it is correct. I believe that if we had carried on this work originally through Miss Lathrop or some other good woman, without the establishment of a new division or a new bureau, we would have saved the Government three hundred or four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to indulge me for just a moment on this matter. I have been for two or three years connected with the appropriations for this bureau. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] states substantially what has occurred. The bureau is headed by Miss Lathrop. I do not take it that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] meant his remarks as an attack upon Miss Lathrop, but only to remind her that the proposed trip abroad was not strictly within the line of her official duty; that it would necessarily result in the expenditure of public funds for this service outside of the United States. I supported upon two occasions in the committee and once upon the floor of this Chamber an appropriation for the Bureau of Child Welfare since Miss Lathrop has been put at the head of the bureau. I was associated with her for some years in the western section of the country, especially in Illinois. She came from Rockford originally, where she had charge of a great deal of charitable work, which she performed in a very creditable manner, working out of Chicago, not only in Illinois but in many of the Western States tributary to Chicago.

The Children's Bureau was created for the purpose of taking care, within the limits of the Federal Government appropriations, of children and their welfare within the United States. As the Senator from North Carolina says, it was originally a small appropriation, limited to $25,000; but it has increased, as all such appropriations do. I am not saying that the appropriation of $400,000 is not justified; I will meet that question when it comes up in a proper way in connection with the appropriation bill; but I agree with the Senator from Utah that an official appointed and paid under the appropriation for the Children's Bureau is appointed and paid to attend to the welfare of children in the United States. I can find children in Washington needing the research work of this department and its civilizing influences as much as do the children in Czechoslovakia or in the interior of Poland.

Yesterday I talked with a newspaper man just returned from Warsaw, Poland. More than a million children require help in Poland if they are to be restored to health or to a reasonable prospect of reaching years of maturity.

The effort to improve their condition is to be made as a separate matter; it has no connection with the child-welfare work of the Children's Bureau of the United States, for which Miss Lathrop has been appointed, and out of the appropriation for which she is paid. I regard expenditures outside of the United States as a perversion of the appropriation. I do not think Miss Lathrop on her own motion has taken this step. I think authority has been given her on a suggestion coming from some other quarter, probably from a higher source.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Was the Senator from Illinois present when I stated that the State Department had requested this of the Secretary of Labor? The request came from the Czechoslovakian Government to the State Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was not present when the Senator from Iowa made that statement.

Mr. KENYON. And the State Department, in turn, requested the Secretary of Labor to allow Miss Lathrop to go to that country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I regard that as aggravating the offense, because I regard it as an offense against the appropriating power of Congress and as a departure from the purposes expressed by Congress in creating this bureau. I do not criticize the motive, but I do criticize the action taken on the ground that, under the power given Congress, the appropriation was limited to the welfare of children in the United States and was not to be expended for the purpose of trips abroad.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator object to that because he thinks Miss Lathrop will be drawing her salary during the time she is absent?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily.

Mr. KENYON. She pays her own expenses. She will be absent from the country, that is true; but the President of the United States was absent from the country. Did the Senator from Illinois ever object to that?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I understood; and from the unfriendly comments from the various Democratic and independent editors of the country, I understood they objected to the comments I made upon that question. So I regard myself as peculiarly fitted for criticism of this kind.

Mr. KENYON. I was simply trying to divert the Senator's mind from this particular subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to take further time; but I repeat it is a perversion of the appropriation. It ought not to be tolerated. It is another instance of bureaucratic perversion of power, as frequently happens when once an appropriation is given to a department under a blanket item.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if Miss Lathrop receives no salary and pays her own expenses, then, it will not be a perversion of the funds.

Mr. SHERMAN. She was not appointed for that purpose, to abdicate her functions and go abroad. If she wants to resign and get off the pay roll and go over to serve the children in Czechoslovakia or any other European country, I have no objection to that.

Mr. KENYON. If she is receiving no salary during this time, the Senator would have no objection to that, would he?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would. She is either a Federal officeholder or she is not. If she is a Federal officeholder and appointed as the head of this bureau, then she ought to stay here. I repeat that I can find more children in Washington needing her help than she can find in Czechoslovakia. I know about what will happen to her. She will go over there, and as the head of the Childs' Welfare Bureau she will carry with her credentials from the Department of State and from the Secretary of Labor. She will be received and feted and banquetted and received in all the governmental circles. President Masaryk and his family will spend a great deal of time in showing her about, and will give her enough advantageous slum work to satisfy even a professional of her ability; and she does have great ability in that direction. However, she was not appointed for that purpose. I say it with the greatest respect for Miss Lathrop, and I have boundless respect for her ability in work of this kind, but she was employed for the very purpose of rescuing children from the slums of the United States. I am adhering to my original idea when I say that there is a great deal of work of this character to be performed here at home. She was appointed for that purpose, not to resign or cease to draw her salary and go abroad to take care of the children of other countries, but for the express purpose of taking care of the children in this country. So I think that the criticism of the Senator from Utah—not making any objection to the defense, if any defense is necessary, by the junior Senator from Iowa—is properly offered, not as directed against Miss Lathrop but as against her superior officers who called upon her to go abroad.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

H. J. Res. 305. Joint resolution to amend a certain paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. It simply changes the figure "20" to "21," in the Indian appropriation bill, for one item in regard to Oklahoma.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 305, which will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the fifth paragraph of section 18 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920, which reads as follows: "The sum of $200,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, in aid of the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations and the Quapaw Agency in Oklahoma, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be subject to the limitation in section 1 of the act of May 25, 1918 (40 Stat., p. 564), limiting the expenditure of money to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read:

"The sum of $200,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, in aid of the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations and the Quapaw Agency in Oklahoma, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be subject to the limitation in section 1 of the act of May 25, 1918 (40 Stat., p. 564), limiting the expenditure of money to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 11984. An act to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the pending reservation, which is reservation No. 9.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the reservation just read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, so far as I know, this is the first time in the history of the United States when in entering into a treaty with a number of other nations for the doing of something jointly the United States has stipulated, or attempted to stipulate, that it will not pay or obligate itself to pay its just share of the expenses of the necessary organization. We have entered into treaties with other countries constituting commissions; we have made our contribution year after year to the expenses of those commissions, and I think there never has been a case when in the treaty itself in which we bind ourselves to the constitution of the commissions we specify that we refuse to bind ourselves to the payment of our share of the expenses until or unless the Congress shall in due time make the appropriation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I recollect, all the expenses of the labor conference and of the international bureaus are to be paid as expenses of the office of the secretariat, and, if I remember correctly, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] estimated that the labor commission alone would cost many million dollars. For that reason, it seems quite proper that Congress should make the appropriation before we are bound.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there is a separate reservation, which I presume will be adopted, which refuses to incur any obligation on our part under the labor clauses, even if what the Senator says is correct, that they will involve large expenditures of money.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, just a moment, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But this reservation is so sweeping that not a dollar of the necessary expenses of the League of Nations will be paid by the United States as a definite obligation; we assume not a dollar of obligation for necessary expenses under this reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As a mere matter of domestic legislation and government, I do not presume that in any event we could pay a dollar of the expenses referred to until Congress acted, could we?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not; but the reservation wipes out the obligation.

Mr. BORAH. No. I think it is a superfluity, if I may use the term. The obligation is there, but we simply write what is thoroughly understood already; we rewrite what everyone knows to be true, and that is that we can not get the money out of the Treasury until Congress acts. We could not, if we tried, by treaty change that law; that is the Constitution of the United States. This is another one of those reservations which, in my opinion, does not change anything at all.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me——

Mr. BORAH. I am going to vote for the reservation.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to point out to the Senator from Idaho what the trouble is. If we do not add this reservation money will be spent, as it was spent at the peace conference, without any restriction whatever, and if we do not adopt the reservation we shall be told that we are in honor and morally bound to pay, and, of course, will have to make the appropriation. It will be held up to us that we are morally bound to make the appropriation, and I want Congress to have some control over these expenditures.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that Congress ought to have control, but I go further and say that Congress has control, and that control can not be taken away from Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I agree to that, but I do not want Congress to be met with the proposition when the appropriations come along that we are morally bound to make them, whatever they may be. Turn these gentlemen loose, as they were at Paris, with their hands in the United States Treasury, and if we are morally bound to make the appropriations which we are asked to make we can not tell what they will spend.

Mr. BORAH. No; and that would be true, I presume, whoever was there; but, as I remember, those who went to Paris had their appropriations before they went. However, Mr. President, I simply rose to say that, in my opinion, this resolution does not change anything at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as the Senator from Massachusetts knows very well, a reservation can be drawn so as to limit the obligation of the United States to certain expenditures which are absolutely necessary and legitimate; but, it seems to me, it comes with bad grace from the Senate of the United States to insert a repudiation of a legitimate obligation as to necessary expenses, when the whole country knows that the Senate year after year has voted, and will vote again this year, in favor of maintaining internationl commissions which do no work and render no service. In the Consular and Diplomatic bill which comes here every year we appropriate for the salaries of "lame ducks," former Senators of the United States, sitting upon those commissions and rendering no service whatever.

Mr. KING. We ought to abolish them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We will vote for them again this year.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would name some of those commissions. I recall, as a member of the committee at the last session of Congress having charge of the bill, that we eliminated the commissions not authorized by treaty and one or two which were authorized by treaties. Two or three were restored because the conferees upon the part of the House insisted upon these going back, but we were able to keep some of them out, and I should like to know those which are now in existence, if the Senator will name them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if he knows anything about the Canadian Waterways Commission, and what services those commissioners rendered last year?

Mr. CURTIS. Personally I know nothing about the services they rendered last year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that there are a number of ex-Senators upon that commission.

Mr. CURTIS. No; I do not. I know there is one ex-Senator upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There are a number.

Mr. LODGE. There are two, to be exact.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the Senator ought to know that, practically speaking, that commission rendered no service whatever last year.

Mr. CURTIS. I know that at the last session of Congress the committee attempted to eliminate that commission, but after a full and complete hearing they concluded that the commission were rendering some service. I can not speak for it since that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right in relation to the appropriations made for these commissions; but I want to say that the reason why the appropriations have been made in the past, and up to the present time, is because the treaties that we have made require the appropriations. If those treaties can be set aside I assure the Senator that no appropriations will be made for those commissions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, those treaties in most cases require only six months' notice to set them aside.

Mr. SMOOT. Then that notice ought to be given.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In one case that I have in mind a year's notice is required; but it is not possible to get through the Senate of the United States a resolution giving that notice or to insert in the appropriation bill a provision for giving that notice. We are appropriating here, year after year, tens of thousands of dollars in the payment of salaries for what are practically sinecures, and now the same Senators that are doing that are putting in a provision as a reservation to this treaty by which it is proposed that we shall not assume any obligation even for the necessary and legitimate expenses of this great international organization.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to say to the Senator that, as I stated a moment ago, the subcommittee and the full committee and the Senate at the last session of Congress eliminated all of those commissions that were not provided for by treaty. I understood that the committee requested the Secretary of State to give the proper notice to end the treaty obligations so as to eliminate some of the commissions that were provided for under treaties.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the House at the other end of the Capitol sent us the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill without provision for the Canadian Waterways Commission.

Mr. CURTIS. Not at the last session of Congress.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, this year.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. I know he wants to be correct. The Canadian Waterways Commission and the Mexican Commission have to be provided for under the treaties, as the Senator knows. There is a moral obligation which we have to fulfill.

The House cut down the appropriation for the Mexican Commission to $5,000. That, of course, would have put the commissioner and the secretary at once out of existence, because it would not have paid their salaries, but it would have kept the commission alive.

The other commission is the Canadian Waterways Commission, which has done, I think, work of a great deal of value. There are not a number of ex-Senators on it. There are two ex-Senators on it. One is ex-Senator Obadiah Gardner, a Democrat, from Maine. The other is former Senator Clark, of Wyoming, a Republican. The third is ex-Gov. Glenn, of North Carolina. If they are "lame ducks," two of them are Democrats and one is a Republican.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That does not make any difference.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, one word more.

I think those are the only commissions. The others are small sums of money to which the United States is bound under treaties—small and fixed sums for measuring the earth, and things of that kind, to which we have agreed. They are small sums, but we have agreed to them by treaty, and they create a moral obligation which I have always sustained because it was a treaty obligation.

Here we are dealing with something which will cost millions, a permanent charge on the Treasury reaching to millions. Why, the secretary general alone receives a salary of $50,000. There, I think, we should not be under the moral obligation, and that is the purpose of this reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President that is what I am calling attention to. This body has repeatedly and recently appropriated, and will again appropriate, money unnecessarily for the payment of commissioners who practically render no service—$7,500 a year salary for a commission holding only one meeting in a year!

Mr. LODGE. They have had three meetings this year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say that such a Senate has a conscience that is not so tender as it would seem to be when it proposes to insert here a reservation repudiating even the legitimate office expenses of the secretariat.

I have not any more to say. I just want to expose the fact that this reservation has for its purpose the repudiation of every legitimate expense of this international commission, and that we are not in a frame of mind or of morals to do it. We have never done it before, we are not doing it now, and we are not going to do it next week when we vote on these commissions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator if he believes that Congress could give notice, without action on the part of the President, terminating these treaties?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will answer that question.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say, further, that if it can be done, I think it ought to be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that in the forthcoming Consular and Diplomatic bill I proposed and secured the insertion of a statement that this was the last appropriation which Congress would make for the Mexican Waterways Commission, and that the Congress thereby requested the State Department to give the necessary six months' notice for the termination of our obligations under it. I believe that these sinecures ought to be abolished, and I say that the Senate, which has tolerated them, and which will continue to tolerate them in spite of protests, is in no condition to make a reservation of this sort, repudiating perfectly legitimate obligations.

Undoubtedly it would be possible to frame a reservation to limit our obligations so as to provide against extravagance; but to say that we will not be obligated for anything, when we know that the ratification of the treaty calls for the constitution of the commission and other bodies, is a perfectly ridiculous and disgraceful attitude for the Senate to assume.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the commission known as the Commission on the International Boundary Between the United States and Mexico is a joint commission composed of representatives of the two nations lying on each side of the Rio Grande River. That commission was created by a treaty or series of treaties between the United States and Mexico designed to settle the question of shifting boundaries and also to dispose of controversies between Mexicans and Americans over conflicting appropriations of water for irrigation purposes from the Rio Grande River.

I never have been able to discover why the treaties were ever negotiated. By the opinion of the then Attorney General of the United States it was declared, and I think unanswerably, in 1896, that no obligation rested upon the United States to recognize the property of an alien in any appropriation of water in that part of a stream which was not international but wholly confined within the boundaries of the United States. The treaties, however, were negotiated, and this commission was created, and appointments were made by both Republics of their respective members.

If the commission could discharge the obligations resting upon them in view of this treaty, which, in my judgment, should be abrogated as soon as possible, at least so far as concerns the distribution of water from the Rio Grande River to Mexican claimants, they would be constantly engaged in defining and stabilizing as far as possible the shifting boundary between the two Republics. I call it "shifting," because it is subject to the fugitive action of the Rio Grande River, which frequently makes for itself a new channel in its course to the Gulf, and thereby creates a situation which, owing to the uncertainty regarding the boundary, makes these new places favorite localities for thieves and outlaws of every description. We did manage, however, to get along in some way before that treaty was negotiated. The difficulty with that and with these other commissions which do not function is that they are the outgrowth of covenants between independent nations, and if we had not those covenants there would be no necessity for the commissions. I think many of the commissions provided for by this treaty will prove to be equally useless and expensive.

I do not like to differ with my very dear friend from Nebraska upon any subject, and especially any subject of legislation; but I am convinced that the proposed reservation is essential to the protection of the Treasury of the United States, which otherwise will be called upon to guarantee the performance of many moral obligations created because of the assumption, there being nothing said in the reservation, that these expenses would be recognized and provided against; and, indeed, I do not see how we could avoid the meeting of any expenses incurred by any of the commissions to be created by this treaty unless we are forehanded enough to provide that no expenses will be recognized until authorized by congressional appropriation. It will have a restrictive effect, and particularly in the development and execution of part 13, under whose provisions, if carried out literally, as they probably will be, the mind of man can hardly conceive of the imposition of any limitation on the demands that may be made upon the Treasury of the United States.

If we had not these covenants in previous treaties, unprotected by reservations of this kind, we would not have commissions that do nothing except exist, and the places upon which are regarded merely as sinecures for the favorite appointments of both the great political parties.

The lesson which I draw from that situation is that having made two mistakes—first, with reference to the treaty affecting our Canadian boundary; and, second, with regard to the treaty affecting our Rio Grande boundary—we had better safeguard ourselves as to this greater treaty by announcing to the world, in a reservation, that expenditures shall be limited to the amounts which, in the discretion of Congress, are desirable. Otherwise, we may be face to face with bond issues to meet obligations which we can not very well avoid because of the conditions for which we are responsible through the covenants of the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there has been suggested a slight amendment to this reservation, which I hope some Senator on the other side of the Chamber will present. It is that in line 2 we strike out the word "or" and add "except the office force and expenses of the secretariat."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bipartisan conference that has been talked about so much had that subject under consideration. I hesitate somewhat to state anything that the bipartisan conference did, because nobody seems to agree——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota. I thought he was going to take the floor, and I did not address the Senate a little while ago for that reason. If he will proceed, I will follow him.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want to explain what that is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will take the floor as soon as the Senator has concluded. I shall be glad to do so. I want him to take the floor. I do not mean to object.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will explain it, then, if the Senator wishes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall be glad to have the Senator explain that first.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I understood, it was the intention to except the office force and the salary of the secretary general. That was my understanding; but the way it is put here it excepts everything following the words—except the office force and expenses of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee of conference, or other agency—

And so forth.

Now, as a matter of fact, the expenses of the secretariat's office do not simply include the salaries of the secretary general and his office force and office expenses, but under the treaty they include all international bureaus, the labor conference and everything else, which are called the expenses of the secretariat. So if the Senator from Georgia wishes to offer that amendment I suggest that it be in this form:

Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share of the expenses of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

Those expenses under the treaty are divided on the same basis as the International Postal Agreement expenses, and so far as I am concerned I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator that I did not desire to offer it, but I was under the impression that the Senator would. I hope he will offer it, and I will support it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I do not yet see the force of this proposition. I do not know how you would get money to pay it without having an appropriation by Congress for the office of the secretariat.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not either.

Mr. BORAH. Then what is the necessity of the reservation at all?

Mr. KELLOGG. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said, we do not wish the secretary general to be authorized to bind the United States to pay all the expenses of all the bureaus, including the labor bureau and everything else, until Congress shall authorize it. That was the object of it. Otherwise we would be bound to pay all these expenses, and unless Congress did authorize it we would be violating the treaty; that is all.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from Idaho one question? Assuming that we become a member of the League of Nations and ratify the treaty, and become a member of it to any extent, subject to these reservations, as long as we are a member, even to that extent, is there not a moral obligation to pay our share of the expenses?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; regardless of the reservation.

Mr. NELSON. Regardless of the reservation and regardless of putting it in.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. NELSON. So there can be no harm in making such a reservation?

Mr. BORAH. No; no harm.

Mr. NELSON. It is based upon the moral obligation that underlies it.

Mr. BORAH. It is no harm and no benefit. In view of the possible amendment which is to be offered, may I call attention to a dispatch which appeared in the New York Sun a few days ago? It says:

The annual sum of $1,194,591,000 is estimated as necessary at the beginning to finance the League of Nations, according to the report of an accountant employed by the American Agricultural Association. It is figured that this enormous aggregate may be increased 100 or 200 per cent because of red tape, etc.

It is computed by this accountant that 185,167 persons will be given office under the League of Nations during the first year of its existence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not catch the number.

Mr. BORAH. One hundred and eighty-five thousand one hundred and sixty-seven persons.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From the United States alone?

Mr. BORAH. No; under the League of Nations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From all countries?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; from all countries; 185,167 persons.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. If this is put in for the purpose of covering the moral obligation, we do not want the moral obligation to pay an unlimited number of employees until Congress shall have passed upon it. I think it applies, in other words, to one just the same as the other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what gentleman made that close calculation?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it is close. I think it is underestimated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the Senator think about 5,000,000 people will be employed? I think it ought to have been 5,000,000 so as to make really a striking figure. Round figures would be much more effective.

Mr. BORAH. No; I think the gentleman has been overmodest, as all these advocates of the league are.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think he is an advocate of the league.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; he is. This is an accountant employed by the American Agricultural Association.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He is not an advocate of the league.

Mr. BORAH. But the association is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the Sun is not an advocate of the league. That is an enemy of the league the Senator is reading from.

Mr. BORAH. This is published as a news item; and the New York papers, whether for the league or not, publish the news. We all admit that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would be a much better news item if they would say there would be 10,000,000 employed, just at a rough guess.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it would be much better, but that would be made to appear untrue if it were not printed by a league paper.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think if the Senator really wants to make a deep impression he should tell the Senate on the reliability or on the faith of some obscure John Smith that he understood a little bird told him that 10,000,000 people were going to be employed by the league. That would really be something striking.

Mr. BORAH. A bluebird?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; a bluebird.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Nebraska misunderstood the Senator from Idaho. As I understood him, it was $85,000 of appropriation and 165 people only. Is not that correct?

Mr. BORAH. I think that might likely turn out to be true, but I have stated what appears here. I give this as a news item, which I realize is altogether likely——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator ought to put it in under the heading of a fairy tale. That would be much more appropriate.

Mr. BORAH. No; I am stating it as an antileaguer, and we do not indulge in such things.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. On the 10th of November the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] offered, and there was incorporated in the RECORD, to be found on pages 8190, 8191, and 8192, a statement purporting to be an audit of the probable annual expenses of the League of Nations. It was prepared by Mr. Fred A. Dolph, of this city, a lawyer and an accountant of standing, who was employed to prepare an estimate of the annual budget of the League of Nations in operation.

Mr. Dolph has complied with that—

The Senator from Missouri said—

and at the request of the American Agricultural Association—

And so on. In that statement will be found corroboration of what the Senator has stated. In my opinion, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me to differ from him, if they put into operation the labor provisions of the League of Nations, there is no question but that there will be 185,000 employees and more.

Mr. BORAH. They are in operation now.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Georgia is not going to offer it, I will offer this amendment as a proviso to the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. I will let the Senator offer it, and then I will take the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota offers the following amendment to the reservation.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed reservation No. 9 add the following:

Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share of the expenses of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

Mr. BORAH. Let us see how it will read.

Mr. NELSON. There is a mistake. This is an amendment to the amendment and not to the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. No; there is no amendment pending.

Mr. NELSON. The words "shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share" mean nothing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Assistant Secretary just stated it, but he will state it again.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Idaho, I believe, has the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Senator from Idaho has not the floor. The Chair recognized the Senator from Minnesota to offer the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I yielded to the Senator for the purpose of offering it, but if the Senator wishes the floor I will yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not understand that the floor was yielded for the purpose of voting on it.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If so, I yield the floor entirely.

Mr. BORAH. The reservation as it will read if amended provides as follows:

The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States proportionate share of the expenses of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

In other words, then, we are going to create the moral obligation, we will say, of paying our proportion of all expenses, which the secretary general, who starts out with a salary of $50,000 a year and all of his office force, regardless of any action upon the part of Congress with reference to what they shall be. We are placing in their hands the power to impose any indebtedness upon us they see fit or any charge or any sum, and it becomes a moral obligation which Congress must pay regardless of whether Congress would be satisfied that it ought to have been incurred or not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This proviso or amendment practically assumes, it seems to me, that no appropriation will be necessary by Congress for the office force and the salary of the secretariat. Does it not?

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I agree with the Senator from Idaho that it is necessary for Congress to make an appropriation before the expenses can be paid, but this exception it seems negatives that idea, at least it makes it definite that an appropriation will have to be made for all other purposes except this one.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Of course, they could not actually do that thing, because they could not get into the Treasury until we act, but the moral obligation is there, according to the amendment, which Congress could not repudiate without violating its moral obligation, and which Congress, of course, would not do, because the most difficult thing Congress has to do is to refuse an appropriation when there is even no moral obligation to make it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose they fix the salary at $100,000, would there be a moral obligation on the part of Congress to pay it?

Mr. BORAH. It would under this amendment, undoubtedly.

Mr. OVERMAN. To pay exactly what the league would fix as the salary?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; under this amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that under the treaty as it stands the moral obligation is created not only for these expenses but all others in connection with the secretariat? The amendment does not create any moral obligation; it merely leaves the moral obligation created by the treaty in so far as the salary and office expenses of the secretary general are concerned.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator is entirely correct. Therefore I come to the conclusion that either one or both is of no necessity. If we leave the moral obligation here to pay the office expenses and all the salaries attached, of course it is the same thing as saying that they shall create as many offices and pay as much salary as they want to do, and we have to meet it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think we would be morally bound to contribute an unreasonable sum. I think it must be reasonable.

Mr. BORAH. Then we ought to leave this amendment out and leave it to the judgment of Congress; but here is a man starting out now with $50,000 a year, and we will say with 150 officials assisting him. This accountant estimated 185,000 persons. Suppose we cut it down about ten times. He is starting out with $50,000 a year, and Congress will be called upon to pay that salary, regardless of whether Congress thinks it is right or not, because we will have the contract here, and as a moral obligation we will do so. I concede that they actually can not get it without the action of Congress, but to put a moral obligation upon Congress is the same as to nullify its power, because Congress will perform its moral obligations. I think the Senator from Minnesota ought not to insist upon the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, all I have to say about it is this: The expenses of the secretariat under the treaty include under article 24 all the international bureaus which now exist, and we do not know how much that cost would be. It was not the intention by this amendment to bind the United States as to those expenses at all, morally or otherwise. Also under the labor clause all the expenses of the labor commission will be treated as expenses of the secretariat. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and myself, in connection with the other Senators in talking it over, agreed that we would recommend to the Senate that so far as the salary of the secretary general and his office force are concerned, there should be a moral obligation, if we go into the league, to pay them, because those would have to continue.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, let us assume that, of course, when we are in the league the moral obligation is there, but, as a mere matter of domestic legislation, does not the Senator think we ought to hold the right to control the question of salaries? We shall have to do it. The people of the country will demand that we shall do it. They will not permit us to pay exorbitant salaries without a revision of them upon our part. Why not, therefore, remove the moral obligation and place it upon a level with the other obligations? If Congress goes into the league, it will do what is right and reasonable, of course, by it. It is in the league, and after you turn them loose, to say that they shall create whatever offices they choose and pay whatever salaries they see fit and that Congress will pay, it is, in my judgment, an unwise thing to do.

Mr. KELLOGG. It certainly would be unwise if it included all the expenses of the secretariat, but it could not possibly amount to a large sum if divided upon the basis of the postal agreement and only included the salary of the secretary general and his office force. It was thought best that there should be a moral obligation to pay that, the same as we have moral obligations under many treaties to pay our share of certain international bureaus. We have entered into a great many treaties without any reservation to pay our share of expenses of international bureaus. I only speak for myself, and I do not care what the Senate thinks about it, but we did not think it wise to bind the United States by a moral obligation to pay the expenses of all these international bureaus or any other expenses which the league might undertake to put upon the people, except the salary of the secretary general, his clerks, or his office force. That, we thought, was not unreasonable, but, of course, the Senate can do as it sees fit. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] agreed to it, but if he does not wish to have this amendment made I will withdraw it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object to the modification. It was offered by the other side, and I am perfectly willing to have it adopted.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator say that they offered it on the other side?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] said that he would like to have it offered, and I said I did not think the original covered it.

Mr. LODGE. It does not.

Mr. KELLOGG. And that I would offer this amendment, and I did offer it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, several Senators from each side conferred about a number of the reservations and sought to get together. As one who really desires ratification and does not desire to obstruct ratification, I have been very anxious to vote for whatever measures they agreed upon, because I have looked them over and while they might not entirely coincide with my wishes they are sufficiently near so that I can reconcile my own views, adopting some qualifications, yielding to the views of others, and this is the only way we are really to get together on the reservations and ratify the treaty.

I will not say that the attitude of a Senator who continues to object and object is disgraceful. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] said that the support of this reservation was disgraceful. I do not agree with him at all about that. I think it is a helpful reservation. I am glad to support it.

The argument he makes about the waste of money on certain commissions is an argument in favor of this reservation. If we are so prone to create commissions for retired Senators and retired governors, and having once created them, their influence is so great that we can not afterwards repeal the legislation, then at each step we may well guard against wastefulness. It would be embarrassing if a President, without waiting for legislation, should put in office quite a large number of our friends abroad in connection with this service. We would then dislike not to pass the legislation that would furnish the appropriation to provide for their expenses and salaries.

I am glad to put our friends on notice that they can not expect any salaries or any expenses or have any office under this treaty until Congress has prescribed and provided the pay. This reservation helps to accomplish the bulk of that which the Senator from Nebraska advocated when he criticized existing useless commissions. I will not say that the attitude of the Senator is disgraceful; I will not attribute such an attitude to any Senator; but I may say, and say truthfully, that I have no hope that the Senator from Nebraska will ever vote for a resolution that ratifies this treaty.

Mr. BORAH. That is not the only hope that seems to be hoped.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator desire me to yield to him a moment? For a question, I will yield, though I have not finished.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no more hope that the Senator from Nebraska will vote for a resolution that ratifies the treaty than I have that the three distinguished Senators who are now just across the aisle, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will vote for a resolution that ratifies the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho for a question.

Mr. BORAH. I observe the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] just stepped in and made a statement to the Senator from Georgia. Will the Senator from Georgia tell us as to what the report is from the President?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator has no report from the President.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I thought.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He has no report of any kind, and made no reference to any report or any inquiry of any kind from the President.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that the President and the Senator from Nebraska occupy the same position with reference to the ratification of the treaty? Is it not a further fact that the Senator from Nebraska occupies that relationship because of the fact that the President assumes that attitude?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. I should be compelled to refer the Senator from Indiana to the Senator from Nebraska to answer that question.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. There is one thing which occurs to me in reference to the pending reservation which is a little singular and which, it seems to me, would put our country in a contemptible position if the reservation were adopted. Provided we ratify the treaty and become a member of the league, we say we will be participants in—and we are members, if you please, of a sort of partnership which is engaged in stabilizing the peace of the world; but, while we enter into the league and agree to participate in it, we now propose to say by the reservation that we will do all that is provided, but we will not bear any part of the expense. Would it not be putting our country in a contemptible position, first, to join in the league and then say we shall not share any of the expenses?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all, I will answer the Senator from Minnesota. What we say is that we are going to share the expenses as Congress determines and provides the method of doing so. We do not intend to let one man put the expenses on us. We intend to preserve to Congress some of its constitutional responsibility.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. We do not desire liabilities put upon us at the instance of even the President, unless we have approved them in advance.

Answering the Senator further, we, of course, shall proceed by legislation to provide the places and to bear our full part of the expenses. We shall fix the salaries and the compensation, but we shall do it ourselves. I mean by voting for the reservation to indicate not that we are not going to bear our full part of the expenses, but that we are not willing for the expense to be fixed by the administrative branch of the Government until Congress has approved it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that if we become a member of the league, conditionally, I will say, as we propose to do by adopting the treaty with these reservations, why should we come in and say we will bear none of the expense?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We do not say that.

Mr. NELSON. And more than that, Mr. President, if we are silent on the subject, if we say nothing at all in the shape of a reservation, does not the power still remain in Congress, as it remains in all cases where appropriations of money are concerned? There are many claims pending against the United States in connection with moral obligations, but the claimants never get their money until Congress appropriates it. So it will be in this case; the moral obligation, to say nothing about the reservation, still subsists; but it is like all the other moral obligations of the Government, there is nothing to them until they are followed with an appropriation, as has been done in the case of the humblest claimant against the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am glad to answer the Senator from Minnesota, and the answer is easy. By this reservation we in no way say we shall fail to pay any part of the expense which is properly placed upon us, but we give notice that Congress must approve the salaries and the number of office-holders, and that no obligation is to be placed upon us except in pursuance of action by Congress.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me finish, if the Senator from Missouri pleases.

I am thoroughly in favor of not permitting a crowd of people to be carried to Paris or anywhere else at the expense of the Government and in utter disregard of the constitutional responsibility of the two Houses of Congress.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I agree with the position which the Senator from Georgia takes, that it is unconstitutional to involve the Government for the payment of money until Congress has authorized the expenditure, and that the creation of a moral obligation, say, is a deprivation of Congress or the taking away from Congress of the right to exercise its constitutional prerogative. I think that is the Senator's position. If that is the Senator's position, how does he differentiate between a reservation as to the whole and a reservation as to a part? Without the reservation a moral obligation might be created which would offend against the spirit of the Constitution for the payment of money to support the labor bureau; or, second, for the payment of money to support numerous boards; or, third, for the payment of money to support the office force and to pay the expenses of the secretariat. The Senator admits that the first two propositions would be violative of the spirit of the Constitution because creating a moral obligation to pay when Congress has not appropriated the money nor authorized the expenditure. Why is not that true of the third equally as well as of the first two?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator's question as best I can. I think we may with perfect propriety adopt the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], which is intended to commit us through the treaty to the expenses of a specific office, which will place a moral obligation upon Congress to appropriate money for the expenses of the office named, while we at the same time decline to assume moral liability for much more numerous and indefinite expenses.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think the Senator from Missouri understood the position I took when I explained the amendment. The Supreme Court of the United States has held, and it has been the practice, that the Senate and the President may create a moral obligation or a treaty obligation—whatever it may be called—to pay money, although the Congress may have to make the appropriation. Over and over again it has been held that we have a right by treaty to impose an obligation on the Government to make payment or to do things which would require the action of Congress to carry out. There is not any such thing as a legal obligation or a moral obligation to a treaty—and there is no difference between the two—but there is a treaty obligation, and that obligation may have to be carried out by Congress; yet it does not detract from the right to enter into the obligation. That is the position I took, but I do not think the Senator from Missouri understood me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not yield to the Senator from Missouri for a moment, because I wish to go on with the answer to his question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I will yield and answer the two together.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Georgia take different positions?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We do not.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Minnesota takes the position that the Senate has a right to enter into a treaty which imposes a moral obligation upon Congress to pay all of the expenses of all of these boards, tribunals, and so forth, if it wants to. The Senator from Georgia says, as I understand him, that that is, in fact, a violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. If it is a violation of the spirit of the Constitution to agree to pay the expense of the labor tribunal provided by Part XIII, why is it not equally a violation—and that is the point I am discussing—to pay the expenses of the treaty generally?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Missouri misunderstood me. The violation of the spirit of the Constitution to which I referred would be for a President to create places and put men in them before the Congress authorized the expenditure.

I recognize the fact that a treaty can create a moral obligation upon the part of Congress to appropriate money. The object of this reservation is to prevent that moral obligation, and to limit the creation of places or the placing of men in offices until after, by legislation, we have approved the expenditure; but the proviso of the Senator from Minnesota makes an exception of a limited number of places in the secretariat's office—and, so far as we are concerned, we will vote for that; we are willing to accept that now—as an office that must exist, and accept the moral obligation attendant upon the office. We desire to avoid, however, the obligation in connection with the remainder of these places which might be put on us and which are not yet designated and in connection with which serious embarrassment might be created if we failed to provide the money to pay for them. That is the object I have in voting for this reservation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I understand the difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. REED. As I understand, the difference in this constitutional question is this: If we are opposed to Part XIII, then the appropriation for——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am practically through, and yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. REED. If we are opposed to Part XIII, then for the Government to obligate us in any way to pay the expenses incurred under Part XIII is violative of the Constitution. If we are in favor of the secretariat and of going into the league, then to do exactly the same thing—that is, to obligate ourselves to pay the money to support the secretariat—is entirely constitutional, the construction of the Constitution turning wholly upon the question as to what we want done or do not want done. That, it seems to me, has been the attitude all the way through in this battle.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. In just a moment I will yield. When Senators want to accomplish a certain purpose the Constitution is easily brushed aside; when they think that the purpose that is about to be accomplished is bad, they run to the cover of the Constitution. But if it be unconstitutional, as I certainly thought the Senator from Georgia said several times, to create a moral obligation upon this Government to pay money——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. Prior to the action of Congress authorizing the expenditure of that money, then that rule applies equally to the secretariat and to the labor tribunal, because in each instance a moral obligation is created to pay money without the express authority of Congress, and thus there is imposed upon Congress a condition which practically forces it, in redemption of the national honor, to make an appropriation which it otherwise would not make. I think the Constitution is equally prohibitive in all of these cases or else it is inapplicable to any of them. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator, I hope, does not state that as my position.

Mr. REED. I was speaking of the Senator from Georgia. I understand the Senator from Minnesota takes the position that the Senate can by ratifying the treaty place us in a position where all of these financial obligations can be created by the League of Nations and its machinery, and that it will become our moral duty, our duty as a decent Nation, to redeem them all; but as to all of them except as to the expenses of the secretariat he wants to relieve us from the moral obligation by now saying that we refuse to incur any kind of obligation.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is in substance my position in connection with the expenses of the secretariat. I am not willing that the league shall bind this country to pay all the expenses of the bureaus of secretariat, which include all the bureaus of the labor conference and everything else. The amendment which I offered—perhaps the Senator has not seen it—is not the one in printed form; but it limits the exception simply to the salary of the secretary general and his office force, and does not permit the council of the League of Nations to obligate this country to pay any expenses of the secretariat, which include all of the bureaus and commissions created under the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I am glad the Senator has made that change in his amendment, because I was about to say that under the language employed in the printed copy I think the expenses of the secretariat could be very broad.

Mr. KELLOGG. Quite so.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Georgia; in fact, I yield the floor to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me to finish my observation, I quite agree with the Senator from Missouri that the amendment as it is printed does not express generally, so far as I am concerned, the views which we agreed to recommend. We did think, however, as to the salary of the secretary general and his office force that we could afford to have an obligation rest upon us to pay our proportionate share, as under the postal arrangement—and I do not know exactly what that is—but we were not willing to take in the much larger field of all the bureaus and other expenses of the secretariat.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I really desire to inquire of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] how he figures that it is possible for the Congress of the United States under any circumstances to prescribe the salaries of these officers or the expenses that are to be incurred?

The secretary of the league is appointed by the council of the league. The council, of course, consists of representatives of nine different States. Now, the Congress of the United States could not possibly fix the salary of the secretary. They must act in some way or other in conjunction with the other eight members of the council in fixing the salaries, and so likewise with all subordinates, all the office force.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, quite a large number of these people will be directly representing the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, so far as those directly representing the United States are concerned, the obligation of the United States is direct, and we fix their salaries beyond doubt and beyond controversy or question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can undoubtedly limit the number of those, and limit our representatives——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly we can, but this provision has nothing whatever to do with them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes; it has. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Senator would be obliged to agree with me, because we have already adopted a reservation to the effect that no one shall have any authority whatever to represent the United States upon any of these commissions until his appointment is provided for by an act of Congress. I refer the Senator to the reservation adopted a few days ago, and numbered 7, that takes care of the appointment of any officers who represent this Government. Nothing can be done and no one can represent this Government under that reservation until his appointment is provided for by an act of Congress, and of course that act of Congress will fix his compensation and will fix the number that will represent us; but the other article has not any reference to that. The other article has reference to the salaries of those officers who are not appointed by the United States at all, but are appointed by the council of the League of Nations. It refers not to the activities of our individual members upon any commission but to the expenses of the commissions as a whole. Now, how can the Government of the United States regulate those salaries or those expenses except by simply refusing to make appropriations?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It goes to the extent of declaring that we will not participate in commissions or committees or agencies, and assume liability for them, unless Congress has first approved.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not the point I was talking about. The Senator said that he wanted to have this thing in such shape as that the Congress of the United States could prescribe the salaries of these people.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I inquire of the Senator how that can be done?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It may be that the individual representatives of the United States would be covered by the other provision; but I still think that this provision is most important, even though the individual representatives of the United States were covered by reservation No. 7.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not desire to controvert with the Senator the question as to whether it is or is not important. I am merely directing his attention to that portion of the section under which he said he desired that the Congress of the United States might have control of the salaries to be paid these officers.

Mr. President, I want to invite the attention of the Senator from Georgia to another matter which I am sure is of very great interest to him, by reason of the great attention he has given to the subject of agriculture in general.

In the year 1905 we entered into an agreement much in line with this, with all the leading nations of the earth, to establish an international institute of agriculture with its seat at the city of Rome, in the Kingdom of Italy. That institute has the power under the provisions of article 9 to do the following things:

(a) Collect, study, and publish as promptly as possible statistical, technical, or economic information concerning farming, both vegetable and animal products, the commerce in agricultural products, and the prices prevailing in the various markets.

(b) Communicate to parties interested, also as promptly as possible, all the information just referred to.

(c) Indicate the wages paid for farm work.

(d) Make known the new diseases of vegetables which may appear in any part of the world, showing the territories infected, the progress of the disease, and, if possible, the remedies which are effective in combating them.

(e) Study questions concerning agricultural cooperation, insurance, and credit in all their aspects; collect and publish information which might be useful in the various countries in the organization of works connected with agricultural cooperation, insurance, and credit.

(f) Submit to the approval of the governments, if there is occasion for it, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers and for the improvement of their condition, after having utilized all the necessary sources of information, such as the wishes expressed by international or other agricultural congresses or congresses of sciences applied to agriculture, agricultural socities, academies, learned bodies—

And so forth.

I have no doubt in the world that that method of getting the scientists of the world together for the purpose of carrying on these investigations and gathering this information, so as to promote the interests of agriculture throughout the world, meets the entire approval of the Senator from Georgia, as it does mine. It involves, as a matter of course, a large amount of expense; but we go right in and obligate ourselves—I wish the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was here—morally, at least, to bear our proportionate share of all that expense, whatever it may be, limited as it is by the treaty. We did not think it necessary by any means to say to the other nations of the earth: "Now, that is all right; we will go in with you and gather up all this information for the benefit of our people as well as of yours, but we will not bear our share of any expenses incurred unless Congress shall, in its wisdom, conclude that it ought to do so."

Mr. President, the treaty to which I have just made reference is succeeded by the international sanitary convention. The nations of the earth thought it wise to get together for the purpose of establishing some kind of an organization for the purpose of combating deadly diseases that spread from one country to another. Whatever sanitary precautions may be taken by one nation can hardly be effective unless like precautions are taken by the other nations of the earth; and the administration of that treaty necessarily involves no inconsiderable expense, and we are obliged to bear our share. We have obligated ourselves by entering into that treaty to bear our share.

I am surprised that so good a lawyer as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]—I am very glad he is here now—should take the position that it is beyond the treaty-making power of the Government of the United States to bind the United States to the payment of money by the treaty, and thus impose upon Congress a moral obligation to make the necessary appropriation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me conclude.

Mr. REED. Let me correct the Senator; that is all I wish to do. The Senator is arguing the matter from a wrong basis. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I certainly misunderstood the Senator, then.

Mr. REED. I took the position which I understood the Senator from Georgia was taking, and I argued that, if his position was correct, then it applied to all of the items of expense the same as it would to two of them. I did not take the position for myself that we could not enter into a treaty which would impose upon us a moral obligation to pay money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad to hear the Senator say so, because we have done it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish also to say to the Senator that I did not do so. He entirely misunderstood me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We certainly obligated ourselves by the treaty with Russia in 1867 to pay the Government of that country $7,500,000 for Alaska; we certainly obligated ourselves to the Government of France in 1803 to pay $15,000,000 for Louisiana; and the Congress, recognizing the obligation—moral or otherwise; whatever you may call it—proceeded to make the necessary appropriation.

Mr. REED. I have not any doubt about that proposition, and never have had. We can create a moral obligation. We can create by treaty a great many obligations morally binding this country. Some of them my be of such a nature as to so involve the country's honor as to practically compel Congress to appropriate the money. The question of the wisdom or unwisdom of the proposition, therefore, is one which is always open for discussion. I have not, however, taken the position as a lawyer that we can not create that sort of a moral obligation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I felt sure that the Senator would not, upon reflection at least, and I am very glad that he corrected me in respect to his position with regard to that matter. But, Mr. President, I merely desired to call attention to these specific treaties for the purpose of indicating that this is not the first time that we have entered into treaties with the leading nations of the world, involving the incurring of expenditures of no inconsiderable amount. I am calling specific attention to these matters for the purpose of enforcing the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that this is the first time we have felt called upon to say to the nations of the earth, with whom we are thus going to be associated, as expressed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], "While we are willing to go into this thing with you, you can have no kind of assurance whatever that we will bear our share of the burden of the cost of the operations."

AFFAIRS IN ASIA MINOR.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read; and, upon submitting a few remarks in regard to it, I shall move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 325) was read, as follows:

Whereas the recent outrages perpetrated by the Turks in the Marash region of Cilicia, by which 16,000 Armenians were massacred or perished from exposure after being forced from their homes, afford one more example of the inveterate malice of the Turks against the native Christian inhabitants of Armenia; and

Whereas by the terms of the armistice with the Turks, concluded on October 31, 1918, it was expressly stipulated that "In case of disorder in the six Armenian vilayettes, the Allies reserve to themselves the right to occupy any part of them"; and

Whereas it has been fully demonstrated that there can be no relief from these intolerable and ever-recurring outrages except by the utter exclusion of Turkish military forces and irregular armed bands of Turks and Kurds from the proper territories of Armenia, extending from Ararat and Trebizond to Alexandretta, and comprising the six vilayettes designated in the armistice with the Turks; and

Whereas it is within the power of the allied Governments to summarily terminate these outrages and to redeem the pledges given for the complete territorial rehabilitation of Armenia and the restoration of the national life of the Armenian people; and

Whereas the victory of the allied and associated powers over the Germans and their Turkish allies will have been in vain for the rectification of conditions in the Near East unless the territorial and political rights of the Armenians be vindicated and restored; and

Whereas any further temporizing with or toleration of these outrageous conditions or arrangements which recognize Turkish sovereignty in Armenia will be pregnant with future disorders, wars, massacres, and would constitute a cowardly default of duty on the part of the Christian powers: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States does hereby express its profound sympathy for the Armenian people in their present distress, separation, and suffering; and

Resolved further, That it is the sense of the Senate that the allied powers which accepted the capitulation of the Turks in the late war should now impose terms upon the Turks for the complete liberation of the Armenian people, and the vindication and restoration of their territorial rights and political independence, and that adequate military measures be forthwith taken, in conformity to the terms of the armistice with the Turks, to occupy Armenia, to expel all armed Turks and Kurds from the said six vilayettes, to protect the inhabitants against a recurrence of these disorders and outrages, and make them secure in their persons and property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution offered by the Senator from Utah will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, apropos of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the discussion in which he has indulged concerning the conditions in the Near East, I ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 326) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of the report on conditions in Asia Minor and the Caucasus made by the mission headed by Maj. Gen. James C. Harbord, and known as the "Harbord mission."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the request to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is the request contained in the resolution in the usual form?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; the resolution contains the usual phrase, "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought the request contained in the resolution of the Senator from New York which has just been submitted had been made quite a while ago and had not been complied with?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is correct; but I thought perhaps, upon a second trial, we should get a reply.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would be well when the resolution is taken up for action if the Senator will add to it some reference to the former resolution which was passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought in submitting this resolution that such a reference might be regarded as a discourtesy, and I merely desire to bring the request again to the attention of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, while the Senate still holds in lively recollection the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] regarding the horrors of Turkish misrule, its long continuance, and the natural demand among Christian peoples for the expulsion of the Turk from Europe and his confinement to the frontiers of Anatolia, where numerically he is preponderant, it may be worth while for a moment to consider the circumstances which make the fulfillment of the policy so ably advocated by my friend almost impossible for the great powers of Europe.

We think of the British Empire as Christian. The constitutional head of the Empire is the head of the established church in Great Britain. The Christian population of the British Isles and the self-governing dominions number perhaps some 60,000,000. But in India alone there are more Mohammedan subjects of George V than there are Christians in all the British Empire. The assumption of government in Mesopotamia, the declaration of a protectorate de jure in Egypt, the establishment of a protectorate de facto in Persia have added well-nigh 30,000,000 to the number of Mohammedan subjects under the Government if not under the sovereignty of the constitutional head of the British Empire. I think I shall not exaggerate if I say that in Africa, in the Levant, in India, and Malaysia there are well-nigh twice as many Mohammedans who owe allegiance in law or in substance to George V as there are Christians in the whole Britannic Empire.

The circumstances which determine the foreign policy of France in the Levant are not different in kind, even though they differ in degree, from those which determine the Asiatic and Turkish policy of the British foreign office. In Algiers, in Tunis, and in Morocco and in Syria there are great Mohammedan populations—old and new subjects of the French Republic, all of them brought under that subjection by the sword. In Morocco even now the forces of the French occupation and those of the rebel tribes are engaged in sanguinary encounter. Doubtless the Senator from Utah, who has studied this problem, can not escape the conclusion that the most recent outrages at Marash were brought on at this moment in the course of the rising of the Mohammedan population against the inadequate military force which represented the new and unwelcome dominion of France.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator has referred to the "new and unwelcome" force of France. That force was there, however, pursuant to the armistice, which provided that in any of the territories of that region the allied Governments, for the purpose of keeping peace, might maintain troops until after the treaty of peace was signed. So that troops were there in virtue of the armistice.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely.

Mr. KING. And were rightfully there.

Mr. McCORMICK. But the Senator doubtless has followed the discussion of the relations between the Emir Feisal, speaking for the King of Hejaz, and the French and the British Governments, acting under the Sykes-Picot agreement. Not only were the French forces in Marash in pursuance of the armistice agreement, but I am disposed to believe that unless they may be replaced by forces representing the Hejaz they ought to return. Sir, that is not the issue which I am raising here; but I do wish to make it clear that it is the annexation of Syria to the French dominion under form of mandate which has vastly complicated the problem of the expulsion of the Turks from Constantinople and of their control within Anatolia.

If I had known that this issue was to be raised in the Senate to-day, I should have brought with me the text of the protest of the Mohammedan population of India against the expulsion of the Turks from Constantinople. Their protest was indorsed by the British undersecretary for India, Lord Sinha, and, as I recall, by the Maharajah of Bikanir, both of them Indians and neither of them a Mohammedan by profession.

During the last century the Mohammedan population of India, since it is in the minority, has been the one which has most consistently supported the British rule. Mr. Lloyd-George, in the House of Commons, defended, or at least palliated, the agreement to permit the Sultan to remain in Constantinople, because of the demand of the great Mohammedan populations of the British Empire.

Not in our time, Mr. President, will it be possible for any British foreign secretary to determine upon a foreign policy in the Levant or in Central Asia, except after full consideration of the demands and the opinions of the Mohammedan populations of the Empire, unless, indeed, British dominion over those populations shall fall.

It must be so. The prejudices, if you please, of a polygamous potentate may be more important in determining the final decisions of British foreign secretaries than the views of a majority of a Christian House of Commons. The Mohammedan populations are to be represented in the assembly of the League of Nation by the member for India. We pledge ourselves, if we assent to the treaty on the terms submitted to us, to guaranties which are likely to lead us to the support of that very policy which Lord Bryce and which the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] join in condemning.

Lord Robert Cecil has raised his voice against the continuance of the Turk in Constantinople, but none of us here imagines that it will have any ultimate influence in the determination of the fate of the Dardanelles. Constantinople will remain Mohammedan unless the Governments at Paris and at Westminster are able to induce the leaders of Mohammedan opinion to acquiesce in the expulsion of the Sultan from his capital. Nothing that we can do, nothing that we can say, will have any influence on the determination of what may be done there. Asiatic forces so strong that they can not be utterly controlled in Europe are at work determining that policy. It is the price which the Christian peoples of France and of Britain must pay for their dominion over Asiatic populations. The conquest of Mohammedan peoples inevitably has placed certain bonds upon their masters, who can not travel in a direction entirely opposite from that of their bondsmen. It seems to me futile for the Senate to consider expressing any judgment upon a policy which can not even be determined by the conscience of the foreign ministers of France and Britain.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a few days ago I offered a resolution looking to the opening of diplomatic negotiations for the acquisition of the Bermuda Islands. That resolution was referred to the Foreign Relations Committee. Since that time the editors of some newspapers in the country seem to have worked out the idea, through a fermented brain of some character, that this was a move to extend prohibition and secure more "dry" country, or so-called "dry" country. There was no such intention whatever in my mind in introducing the resolution. Apparently, we have as much "dry" territory now as we shall be able to hold for some time.

I did offer the resolution for a very serious purpose. It may not have been the proper diplomatic way to do, but, as I am in favor of "open covenants, openly arrived at," I thought we might as well go to it openly and squarely. Since that time, however, very valuable evidence in the way of opinion has been presented.

The former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, in an interview which has been published in several of the papers, has not indorsed particularly the proposition which I presented, but has indorsed the general proposition of the United States acquiring some of these islands. The interview is very short, and I ask to have it published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York World of Mar. 3, 1920.]

WANTS UNITED STATES TO BUY BRITAIN'S ISLANDS—M'ADOO WOULD HELP HER PAY WAR DEBT BY PURCHASING JAMAICA, BERMUDA, ETC.

The Evening World published a dispatch yesterday from David Lawrence, its Washington correspondent, saying William G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury, is putting forward a suggestion that the United States buy some of the British islands off the Atlantic coast in order to reduce the British war debt to us and to reduce taxation in this country.

Mr. McAdoo says in part:

"It is highly desirable, both on our own account and that of our allies, that the settlement of our loans to our allies be rendered as quick and as easy as possible. Our chief debtor is, of course, Great Britain, and this arises naturally out of the fact that Great Britain has liberally pledged her credit to sustain that of her allies.

"Now, for the last 100 years Great Britain has held certain islands in and near our shores—Jamaica, the Bahamas, Barbados, Nassau, and the Bermudas—off our south Atlantic coast, as well as British Honduras.

"These British possessions, so long held by a friendly maritime power, do not jeopardize the security of the Atlantic and Gulf coast of the United States. With the process of time we have now become the leading economic power in the world and have developed the Panama Canal and a Navy and merchant marine which make these islands more than ever important to us.

"Might it not be possible to work out a plan by which England's debt to us could be reduced by the transfer to us of certain British possessions in the Western Hemisphere to the extent of their value?

"I see nothing in such a proposal to offend the just pride of a great people, whereas such a liquidation of a portion of the British debt might be a happy solution of a part of Great Britain's immediate financial problem."

At his home last night, following his return from Washington, Mr. McAdoo told a reporter for the World his suggestion had been correctly presented. He said he was putting it forward merely as a suggestion for a means of relieving the situation.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. Edwin E. Slosson, who is the literary editor of the Independent, some time ago in the New York Tribune, in an article submitted in their contest for planks for the Republican national convention, where prizes are to be awarded for the best plank, suggested substantially this same idea. I ask to have that published in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Tribune of Feb. 10, 1920.]

TO-DAY'S PRIZE LETTER.

To the EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE.

SIR: It seems to me that one of the needs of the hour is an open, well-defined, and far-looking policy toward the European dependencies south of us. The Republican Party, by its principles and traditions, should take the lead in this. It was Lincoln and Grant who proposed that the Virgin Islands and San Domingo should be taken under our wing, but the honor of carrying out this Republican policy was left to Wilson. The Republican platform, therefore, should have some such plank as the following:

The Secretary of State should immediately open negotiations with British, Dutch, and French Governments for the purchase of any or all of their possessions in South and Central America and the West Indies and their annexation to the United States with the approval of their inhabitants.

SOME ESSENTIAL POINTS.

In support of this a few points may be mentioned:

1. The annexation of the European possessions in the Tropics would be carrying out the Monroe doctrine to its logical conclusion.

2. It is in line with the Lodge resolution passed by the Senate in 1912 to protect the approaches to the Panama Canal.

3. These territories could be accepted in part payment for the $4,277,000,000 which we have loaned to Great Britain and the $3,048,000,000 that we have loaned to France. This is our only chance of recovering this money in the near future, for we can not even collect interest on it now without embarrassing and alienating all our European friends.

4. The three Guianas—British, Dutch, and French—are the only tropical territories that we can obtain without offending the Latin-American republics. Less than 1 per cent of the land is under cultivation, and the interior is mostly uninhabited. Their mineral and forest wealth is known to be great, and their agriculture is susceptible of unlimited expansion. They could supply us with immense amounts of sugar, rice, rubber, coffee, cocoa, alcohol for motor fuel, beef, hides, hemp, and coconut oil.

WOULD REDUCE TAXATION.

5. If any one of the Guianas were acquired, a railroad could be run from the north coast to the southern boundary, where it would connect with the Amazon system of Brazil, thus bringing us into contact with the southern republic most friendly to us.

6. Notwithstanding the high price of sugar, the commerce of the Guianas declined during the war on account of their unnatural political connection with Europe. Not a single Dutch ship visited Dutch Guiana in 1918.

7. Many of the people of the Caribbean region are as eager to come under the Stars and Stripes as the Virgin Islanders. This is proved by the fact that they are now flocking to the United States in thousands.

8. The acquisition of such territory would serve two purposes: (a) It would reduce Federal taxation by turning our European loans from a loss to a profit; (b) it would reduce the high cost of living by giving us easy access to new sources of food and fuel.

EDWIN E. SLOSSON.

Mr. KENYON. In 1886 there was published in Harper's Magazine an article by Maj. Gen. George B. McClellan dealing with this subject, and pointing out the dangers to the American Nation of any foreign nation controlling islands such as the Bermudas and the Bahamas, so near to our shores. I ask to have that inserted as a part of the RECORD. It is very short or I would not do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Excerpt from Maj. Gen. George B. McClellan's article, "The Militia and the Army," published in Harper's Magazine of January, 1886.]

First let us glance hastily at some of the possible and probable sources of difficulty from abroad. This is a Nation of more than 50,000,000 of people, proud, self-reliant, enterprising, and courageous. Well within the memories of a large part of our population we possessed a vast mercantile marine, whose flag was seen in every port of the known world. One of our greatest needs is an outlet in foreign markets for the immense products of our soil and of our manufactories. It is certain as fate that under the pressure of necessity, and with wise legislation, our commercial marine will soon revive and ere long resume its old position before the world.

One effect of this change will be to throw us into still closer relations with the other nations—relations in the main very beneficial to all, but at the same time rendering us more liable to be affected by their difficulties, and necessarily giving rise to causes of friction from which we are now free.

For example, when the western Atlantic is once more crowded with our ships engaged in commerce with all parts of the world, we will begin to ask ourselves by what right a foreign nation holds a cordon of fortified naval stations commanding so many avenues of approach to our shores and enabling it to cut off our vessels in the event of war. Halifax, the Bermudas, Nassau, and Jamaica are important to England not so much for purposes of self-protection, not so much for her own commerce, as they are for bases of operation against us.

In the late war if Bermuda and Nassau had been in our possession, the contest would have been shortened some two years, for blockade running would have been well-nigh impossible.

This is one cause of friction which must inevitably arise with our growth, and one reason why we should be prepared to defend our sea coast.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have seen in some of the English journals the intimation that this attempt was very ill-advised and showed a lamentable ignorance as to the indivisibility of British territory. There may be something in that. If that is so, it is well that India and Egypt should become acquainted with the fact, as they will have no opportunity, if that is Britain's position, ever to obtain independence.

The Bermuda Islands are, I think, less than 800 miles from New York, and about the same distance from Charleston. The Bahamas are even closer to our coast. I regret that in these peace negotiations there was not some effort made, when it probably could have been done, to acquire some of these islands. The United States was asking for nothing, and, of course, got nothing; but it would have been a very proper thing to work out in the most friendly spirit with Great Britain the accession of some of these islands.

I am sorry I have not a map here, so that I could point out to this large audience of Senators the strategic value of what is known as Viequez Sound, both in connection with this question and likewise in connection with the acquisition of the Bahama Islands. To the east of Porto Rico, bounded on the south by Viequez Island, on the east by St. Thomas and St. Croix and St. John, and on the north by Culebra Island, is what naval officers say is one of the three greatest naval maneuvering grounds in the world. That accounts, I think, for our acquisition of the Virgin Islands. It was purely strategic. If for any other purpose, the purchase was a gold brick. From that strategic naval point there is control of the Mona Passage, control of the Windward Passage, and protection of the Panama Canal. It commands our shores from New York to the Orinoco; but when you come to draw a line from this wonderful naval maneuvering ground and strategic standpoint to New York City your line will go squarely through the Bermuda Islands, or if you should draw the line to about Jacksonville, in Florida, it would go through the Bahama Islands.

This question involves the protection of the United States in the future—a long way ahead, possibly, to be sure. It is to be hoped that we will always have friendly relations with Britain. Nothing could be more unfortunate than trouble between the two great English-speaking nations, because civilization depends upon these nations standing together; but at the same time we ought, in a perfectly friendly way, to take up this question of securing some of these islands, for the Bermuda Islands might become to us what Heligoland was to Britain. Now, with a condition of affairs where we can not look for the payment at present of the interest on the debt which Britain owes to us, certainly Britain should not be offended by suggestions that in a perfectly amicable and friendly way the question be taken up diplomatically of the acquisition of these lands, and the price credited upon the debt which Britain owes to us.

The Foreign Relations Committee could secure very valuable evidence upon this question by calling before them the officers of our Navy. I trust they will do so.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Gronna	McNary	Simmons
Borah	Hale	Moses	Smith, Ga.
Brandagee	Harris	Myers	Smith, Md.
Calder	Henderson	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Hitchcock	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Spencer
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Cummins	Kellogg	Phelan	Thomas
Curtis	Kendrick	Phipps	Townsend
Dial	Kenyon	Pittman	Trammell
Dillingham	Keyes	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Elkins	King	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Kirby	Ransdell	Warren
France	Knox	Reed	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Sheppard	Williams
Gay	Lodge	Sherman
Gerry	McCormick	Shields

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to reservation No. 9.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family, and I promised to pair with him during his absence. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and I therefore do so. I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent, and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I inquire if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote. If I were privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Has the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a general pair with that Senator, and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea." I ask that this announcement of the transfer of my pair may stand for the day.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am advised that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] if present, would vote "yea," and therefore I feel privileged to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—55.

Beckham	Hale	Lodge	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Harris	McNary	Smith, Md.
Capper	Henderson	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Spencer
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sterling
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Curtis	Kellogg	Phelan	Townsend
Dial	Kendrick	Phipps	Trammell
Dillingham	Kenyon	Pittman	Wadsworth
Elkins	Keyes	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Warren

Fernald	McCumber	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Glass	McKellar	Sherman	Williams
Gore	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

So Mr. KELLOGG's amendment to reservation No. 9 was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon reservation No. 9 as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and agreed to has undoubtedly improved this reservation somewhat; but before Senators vote upon the reservation as it has been amended I want to call their attention to the comparatively insignificant proportion of the expenses of the league which are involved as an obligation of the United States.

Article 6 of the league provides that—

> The expenses of the secretariat shall be borne by the members of the league in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

It was asserted in the statement prepared by some alleged auditor, referred to by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a little while ago, that the United States would be called upon to bear the chief expenses of the league. The Senator from Idaho did not read it, but this distinguished auditor declared that "the United States having a larger amount of taxable wealth than any other nation will be called upon to pay the bulk or at least a very large percentage of such annual expenses." That statement by this distinguished auditor was about as reliable as his preposterous figures estimating the number of employees of the league.

The United States will not be called upon to pay the bulk of the expenses. It will not be called upon to pay expenses larger than any other country, because the treaty that we have establishing the Universal Postal Union provides that the expenses shall be borne by seven classes of nations; that the first class shall bear 25 per cent of the expenses; that is to say, one-quarter of all the expenses shall be borne by nations that are in the first class, and that they shall equally bear them. What are those nations? In the first class are Germany, Austria—we will eliminate Austria, the war probably having made Austria unable to bear her share—but there still remain Germany, the United States, France, Great Britain, British India, the Commonwealth of Australia, Canada, the British Colonies and Protectorates of South Africa, the whole of the other British Colonies and Protectorates, Italy, Japan, and possibly Russia.

Now, the United States bears no more than France; it bears no more than Great Britain; it bears no more than the other nations named and classified in the first class. The smaller nations are put in the six other classifications and they bear still smaller proportions. But, as a matter of fact, out of the total expenses of the Postal Union last year, which amounted to 160,000 francs, the portion of the United States was 6,280 francs, thus bearing out the statement I have made that the proportion of expenses which the United States will bear in the Leauge of Nations is insignificant. It is no more than many of the other nations. It is no more than Canada, that your Senators on the other side of the aisle are trying to disfranchise and deprive even of a vote in the assembly. So it is preposterous to say that the United States may be burdened with an untold expense unless the Senate provides a reservation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator give an estimate of the working expenses of the league, if it should be operating as contemplated by the Paris conference?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not in a position to give the working expenses of the league, as the Senator can very well imagine, and no one here is in position to give it, but we know that all those countries are interested just as much as we are in having the expenses reasonable and moderate. What I am standing for here is to repudiate and deny the assertion which has been made that the United States is going to be burdened with the great bulk of the expenses when there are many smaller nations than the United States that have just as large a portion to bear as we have.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, a respectable British authority has estimated that the League of Nations, if it is operated as framed by the Paris conference, would cost $1,000,000,000 annually. I have the estimate, and I consider him a respectable authority. It is only an estimate of course, but 25 per cent of that would be $250,000,000, of which our proportional share, I anticipate, would be appropriated out of the Treasury. However, even if the amendment should prevail ultimately and the treaty be ratified, will Congress have a right still to appropriate or can we exercise the power? Does the right or the duty exist upon Congress to appropriate the money yet, or can it be taken without tax levy in the manner of many European kings in days past? Will it still require an appropriation from Congress?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does well to say in the manner of many European kings in days past. Those days are past, and they are gone forever. You can not take money out of the treasury of European nations without the authority of their legislative bodies any more than you can take it out of the Treasury of the United States without the authority of its legislative bodies. What I am standing here to do is to repudiate the idea that the United States is to be burdened with an undue portion of these expenses and to repudiate the idea that these preposterous estimates, of which the Senator now brings in another, are worthy of any consideration whatever.

The League of Nations is a comparatively small and simple organization. It could not possibly be made simpler and smaller and perform its functions. The work that is done by the League of Nations under the German treaty will be largely paid for by Germany where commissions are established especially for Germany's benefit.

Germany is compelled to bear all those expenses, and the idea of representing to intelligent people that somebody says, that some little bird whispers that there are 85,000 people to be employed by the League of Nations is simply ridiculous, in view of the fact that the United States, represented as Great Britain is represented and France is represented, and other nations are represented, they would all be equally interested in keeping the expenses within reasonable bounds. Senators can talk it, but it is not possible that Senators can seriously believe such matters.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the authority I referred to was an eminent authority connected with the British Board of Trade. I can not now recall his name, but he is far from being an English sparrow, as the Senator would intimate. He is accepted usually as a competent authority upon that question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that most of such estimates that have been made have been made by gentlemen whose names have been forgotten.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can produce it for the Senator, and I shall put it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in due time to refresh the Senator's memory. Many of the British names are not as familiar to me, not being in constant communication with London, as they are to the Senator. I am United States and can not speak their language as well; I have not the Cockney accent.

The Senator says the days in which kings could levy taxes are over. They are over in Russia. They are over in Moscow and in Petrograd. They are over in Germany. Germany now has a very healthy party in Berlin engaged in the resurrection of the monarchy. Of course, if it came back in its pristine power, it would not quite have the power to levy taxes. There would be the Reichstag that would be resurrected; there would be the Prussian House of Lords or its equivalent representatives from the various German States; but, nevertheless, the Kaiser would control that German Senate, and practically he would have the power. Germany's Government is yet unknown. It may be a contribution to the free democracies of the world—nobody knows. It may be that it will lapse back into the hands of the Prussians and the Kaiser—nobody knows; but who will levy taxes hereafter in Europe is an unknown problem. So far as the functions exercised by Congress are concerned, they retain the power of tax levies, and I assume will continue to do so; but I remind the Senator that as to this document which came to us by way of London it took 1,300 retainers seven months even to frame it. It takes a good many more men to work a harvesting machine or a thrasher permanently than it does to ship it. This document was shipped back here—first being shipped over in embryo with the army of the 1,300 retainers.

There has been no civil list presented here indicating how much it cost to take the 1,300 to Europe and keep them there. It is well known that more than 600 automobiles were parked daily in front of the Hotel Crillon; that the bills which have been sent in for the damage to the property because of the occupancy of the American delegation are staggering, even to the imagination of hotel keepers in Washington. When they look at those bills they think they have neglected something and ought to take lessons from abroad. I am not prepared to say, even on the basis of the International Postal Union, that the expenses incurred by us may not aggregate millions of dollars.

I remember a year ago, Mr. President, that when I ventured an humble prediction that the expenses of the league—not only its peace expenses but its war expenses—if we carried out articles 10 and 11, would be distributed among nations in proportion to their private taxable wealth—that that would be the basis of the charge—I was ridiculed, not only by distinguished statesmen here but by still more distinguished editors and essayists, who appear weekly or monthly, at the utmost degree of self-restraint, in the magazines of this country; they stated that that would never be the basis. Now, it is, in fact, the basis, and the Senator from Nebraska knows that it will be the basis of assessments when the bills are presented to this body and the other House.

The truth is, Mr. President, that a billion dollar estimate for the working expense of the league is a conservative estimate. Nobody will work on the prewar prices; everybody will be on a European basis, under the present inflated volume of the circulating medium; and we shall do well if they do not proceed on the basis of charges in this country when they commence to operate the league.

A billion dollars is not much money, Mr. President, under the present standards of currency. The minting value of an ounce of gold is $20.67. If you take an ounce of gold over to the mint and have it turned into coin it is worth $20.67, although it costs a good deal more than that to secure the gold from the various forms of mining, especially from refractory ores; but the purchasing power of an ounce of gold worth $20.67 is $9 when you go on the market to buy with it and convert it into merchandise. So on that basis the cost of administering the League of Nations will be something like two or two and a quarter times as much as has been stated.

Of course, if it starts on an inflated basis we shall be the ones who pay the larger part of the cost. Money is supposed here to spring out of the soil spontaneously and to drop down as the manna did on the children of Israel when there was a food famine during their peregrinations. It is supposed here that we do not work for money. If anybody in Europe has shown any disposition to reduce the amount of anything which we may contribute I have not ascertained it. Therefore we shall be involved in great expense, whether the obligations are based on the scheme of the Postal Union or any other arrangement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho read the news item at which the Senator from Nebraska took offense, supposing, it seems, that it was with intent to exaggerate the proposition. I did not suppose that it would be questioned. I read it from one of the New York papers, and I find upon examination that it was published in several of them, and no comment has ever been made upon it adverse to the inferences to be drawn from it.

I repeat that the sum which it is estimated will be necessary to start the league after the first year is $1,194,591,000, and that the number of individuals to be employed will be 185,167. It is said that the figures may be increased by either 100 or 200 per cent. I wish to say, however—and this is what I rose to say—that the accountant allowed $550,000 for the trial of the Kaiser. That ought to be eliminated.

Mr. SHERMAN. We get a rebate on that.

Mr. BORAH. As the premier of England has changed his mind as to that question, and the Kaiser is not to be tried, or, if tried, is to be tried by the German authorities, it is fair to say that the $550,000 should be eliminated.

Mr. President, it seems that we have arrived at the time when we ought to come to "close grips" upon this question of what we are going to do. We have been spending all day now upon the question of whether we shall have a reservation upon the question of the expenditures of the league. Everyone knows, of course, that if we go into the league, it does not make any difference what the reservations are, we shall pay our proportion so long as we stay in; there is no possible chance of anything else. If we do not go into the league, of course, the reservation is wholly immaterial. So why not get rid of the reservations about which there is no controversy, except for the mere purpose of delay, and come to the real question of whether or not we are going to agree to the reservation concerning which the real fight is organized?

We postponed the reservation on article 10 a few days ago to see if there could not be reached some compromise, something which would be satisfactory to those who are in favor of ratifying the treaty. I made no objection to the postponement, for I realized that those who are in favor of the ratification of the treaty had a difficult situation with which to deal. In the first place, they had difficulty in agreeing among themselves; and, in the second place, they had still greater difficulty in knowing the views of the gentleman without whose indorsement the ratification of the treaty would be utterly worthless. The situation is such now that I understand they know the views of the President, and knowing the views of the President, it seems to me, there is no justification for our delaying this thing longer.

If the President is satisfied with the Lodge reservations, undoubtedly the treaty will be ratified, and those of us who are opposed to it will have to content ourselves with simply recording our votes against it. If the President is not satisfied with the Lodge reservations, then the Democratic Senators know by this time whether or not they are going to break with the President. If they do not know it to-day, they will know it by Monday morning. Sunday can be utilized for the purpose of taking counsel of themselves and with themselves as to whether they are going to venture upon an open sea without rudder or compass, politically speaking, indicating where in the future they are going to land.

Now, I am speaking in all sincerity. If some other Senator does not move to take up the reservation to article 10 on Monday morning, I shall myself undertake to bring it to a conclusion in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. GORE. I am glad to hear the Senator from Idaho say that he is speaking in all sincerity, because he is speaking in riddles to me. The Senator seems to forget that the Senate is an independent branch of the treaty-making power and in the premises must act upon its own responsibility.

Mr. BORAH. No; "the Senator" did not forget it, but he did not mention it. The newspaper report of the present situation I find in a dispatch sent out by the United Press. After the visit of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the President, being the second visit, the first visit being made by the distinguished Senator from Virginia——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I should like to inquire upon what authority the Senator from Idaho made the statement on day before yesterday that "the Senator from Virginia" was commissioned to go to the White House and did go to the White House to see the President?

Mr. BORAH. I did not say the day before yesterday; I do not know just when the Senator went. I do not know of my own knowledge that he did go; I know that several gentlemen who claim to have seen the Senator at the White House have stated that he was there to see the President; that the Senator did not succeed in seeing the President, but that he did see Mr. Tumulty.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, to me it is most extraordinary that a Senator should be put under espionage and his goings and comings reported from the floor of the Senate. I sat here in plain sight of the Senator from Idaho on day before yesterday when he made the statement that a certain Senator, as he was reliably informed, was at the White House with some form of compromise to article 10 which had been drafted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I could not infer that the Senator from Idaho had reference to me, for I sat here when he made the statement; but I was told—and afterwards ascertained that it was true—that the newspapers subsequently had said that I had been selected by the Senator from Minnesota, or by somebody else, to take this reservation to the White House. There is not a word of truth in it, and the "reliable" information that the Senator assumed to give the Senate was totally unreliable; it was an invention from beginning to end.

I did not go to the White House and seek to see the President; I was not denied any audience with the President. I have not seen the President for about three weeks; but if I had gone, I take leave to say that I regard it as a breach of propriety for a Senator to stand here and assume to say what is the mission of another Senator at the White House.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not feel offended. I have never understood that it was improper to discuss the relationship of the Members of the Senate to the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. If the Senator tells me that he did not seek to have any communication with the President in regard to this matter, I accept the Senator's statement as absolutely correct. I do not understand, however, that the Senator says that; I understand that the Senator says he did not see the President, which I at all times understood.

Mr. GLASS. Had the Senator listened to what I said he would have heard me say that I did not seek to see the President; I did not go to the White House on any peace mission. I went there on an entirely different mission and while there made no reference whatsoever to article 10 or any other article of the treaty or to the treaty in any sense of the word.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; that settles that proposition. Now, if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is present we may find out if he has any communication that is of interest to the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. I suggest to the Senator that hereafter he would better find out what are the facts before he states to the Senate that he is "reliably" informed that such and such is a fact concerning the movements of a colleague.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had perfectly reliable information with regard to it from gentlemen whose reputation for truth and veracity I do not even now question.

Mr. GLASS. I do; that is where the Senator and I differ.

Mr. BORAH. I am not saying that the Senator is not stating the fact; I am not questioning the Senator's veracity; he knows better than anybody else what he went for; but I say that the gentlemen who told me what I have stated are men whose reputation for truth can not be questioned. Those gentlemen saw the Senator go to the White House, and, of course, they drew their inference from that; but that they would mistake the facts is, in my judgment, impossible.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that there be a general amnesty and that the Senator's alibi be accepted. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce now that under the rules of the Senate there must be no expression of approval or disapproval from the galleries, and it will be the duty of the Chair to enforce those rules.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I merely desire to add that the Senator from Virginia is not undertaking to establish an alibi; it is his privilege to go to the White House when he pleases. The Senator from Virginia was simply questioning the propriety of having it announced from the floor of the Senate when he goes to the White House and utterly inaccurate conjectures advanced as to why.

Mr. BORAH. Half the news in the newspapers is about visits to the White House. It is a very rare thing and a still rarer thing that the visitor sees the President when he does go there.

Mr. President, the information which the Senator from Idaho had was published all over the country, and the Senator from Virginia knows that fact. It not only went into the responsible papers but it went through a responsible news organization and association.

Mr. GLASS. It was a totally conjectural statement, nevertheless, and entirely without foundation in truth.

Mr. BORAH. The publication in the newspapers did not come from the Senator from Idaho; the publication came from other sources; and the Senator from Idaho got his information in the only way that he can get information at all in regard to this matter. The Senator from Virginia realizes the embarassing situation of the irreconcilables; they have no friends anywhere, neither in the President nor anyone else; so they must gather their information, as the ordinary citizen gathers his, from the news bureaus and from the goings and comings. Everybody understands, of course, the close relationship of the distinguished Senator from Virginia to the President; and the supposition was that when he went there he went there as a confidential agent. I am glad to find the exact facts about it. Now we can clear up the second proposition. My only desire is to get the real facts before the country. I am perfectly willing to accept the statement of the Senator from Virginia just as he makes it and with its entire implication except as to the question possibly of "decency."

The United Press dispatch reads:

WASHINGTON, March 6.

President Wilson sees little need of conferring with an administration Senator on a possible modification of his determination in regard to reservations on article 10 and other controversial points, it became known to-day.

An official close to the White House declared:

"The President told Senator GLASS what he thought about the treaty two weeks ago. Must he reiterate every day?"

That the President maintains an adamantine attitude toward what he terms "nullifying reservations" is indicated by another official comment concerning the proposed call of Senator SIMMONS at the White House to ascertain whether the President will modify his stand:

"If persuading is to be done," he said, "let them persuade Senator LODGE to change his program. Let it be remembered that it was the President who submitted the treaty."

I do not know whether that is true or not; but it comes from a reliable source of information, namely, the United Press; and the press organizations are represented by very active and capable men and have opportunities of finding out what, of course, a Senator can not find out. The result is that the Senate must rely upon that information, and I do not consider it improper for a Senator upon the floor of the Senate to discuss those things which appear in the public press. I am sure the Senator from Virginia will concede that proposition, and I am now discussing this which appears in this public press.

If it is true, Mr. President, that the President does not propose to yield, then why not bring the matter to a vote and get this thing out of the way, and get ready for the great presidential campaign? If it is true that the President does propose to modify his position, then why not get ready to vote? It all turns upon that proposition. It does not make any difference what the Senator from Virginia says or what any other Senator says. We all know that, whether it can be stated as an actual fact or not, the thing is waiting upon what the final view of the President shall be. If that is known now, let us act. If it can not be known, we must act without it; and why not act now?

What I rose to ask was that we proceed to article 10 and settle this controversy. This other course is mere wasting of time in considering such immaterial matters as to whether or not Congress will pay under a moral obligation or a legal obligation, because we will pay just the same under either. The great controversy arises over article 10, which the President says is the heart of the covenant, and to remove it is to destroy the covenant. It is a simple question of whether he proposes to modify his position or not. If that can be known, or if it is known, there is no possible reason for delaying this matter another 48 hours after Sunday.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am advised that while I was absent from the Chamber the Senator from Idaho made the statement that I had been in conference with the President.

Mr. BORAH. I have just read it, since the Senator came into the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no statement there that I have held any conference with the President.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that the Senator got to see the President. I do not know about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood that the Senator had stated before I came into the Chamber that I had had a conference.

Mr. BORAH. I have understood so; yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Carolina has not had any conference with the President?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not.

Mr. BORAH. And the Senator does not know the President's views upon this question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not from him.

Mr. BORAH. I did not suppose the Senator did from the President direct.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know the President's views upon this question further than I have heard them discussed here in the Senate; but I want to say one thing further to the Senator before I sit down, in reference to a part of this interview.

Mr. BORAH. All right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is said in that interview that the President said that if the Senate could persuade anybody to change, it had better persuade Senator LODGE instead of him. I want to state that if I had seen the President I should not have attempted to persuade him to support the Lodge reservation or amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, after all this giving of views and after these statements, I am now convinced that there is no possible reason for delaying action upon article 10. It has been postponed for a purpose. That purpose was to see whether or not there could be an agreement which would be satisfactory to the ratifiers and satisfactory to the President. You either know whether that agreement can be had, or you do not know. There is no occasion for delaying this matter any longer. We are willing to come to a vote upon that proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator state whom he represents when he says "we"?

Mr. BORAH. "We" represent those men who stand for Americanism and for American institutions—the irreconcilables.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How many can you count on that side?

Mr. BORAH. If you have as many as you had the other day, we have enough to defeat the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to know whom the Senator represents when he says "we," because we are following a program that was laid down by the majority on the other side of the Chamber. Does he represent that Republican majority on the other side of the Chamber when he states that he is ready to take up article 10?

Mr. BORAH. No; I represent, in making this statement, those known as the irreconcilables.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought so.

Mr. BORAH. Whom does the Senator from Nebraska represent?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have not made any statement as to what I desire. On different contingencies I represent different Members on this side of the Chamber; but I will state that I do not sympathize with the statement made by the Senator from Idaho that it is rather a waste of time for us to consider these unimportant modifications that have been discussed here, and I can see that it might be possible to shorten the discussion by coming immediately, or the first thing next week, say, to article 10. I desire to say to the Senator, however, that not only were we not responsible for the delay in coming to article 10, but, if we had been responsible, it would not be because of any desire on our part to find out what the President's attitude is upon that article. We are ready on this side to vote on article 10 at an early date, and it will not be necessary to find out what are the President's views. It will be sufficient to find out what are the views of Democrats on this side of the aisle.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if it is not necessary to find out what are the views of the President, how much longer will it take the Senator to find out what are the views of those on that side of the Chamber?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have presented the offer of 40 Democratic Senators with regard to article 10. Those 40 Senators—and I think there are others—will accept either one of two compromises on article 10 which have been printed and laid before the Senate. If neither one of those is accepted, and no other compromise is offered which is satisfactory, there will be sufficient Senators on this side of the aisle to refuse a ratification of the treaty with the present Lodge reservation on article 10.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With the aid of the irreconcilables.

Mr. BORAH. You need not worry about the irreconcilables. Nobody wanders around to find out what they are going to do. They are against this on the ground of principle, and therefore, of course, they will remain against it. I do not say that in disparagement of the Senators who are for ratification. You are just as irreconcilable as we are.

You are irreconcilable unless you can have your particular kind of a reservation. We are irreconcilable unless we can have our particular kind of a treaty, which is no treaty at all; but you will not yield an inch farther, as I understand. If you can not get the two reservations which you have offered—what is known as the Taft reservation, which has been adopted by our friends over there, or the other reservation—then you say that there are sufficient votes upon the other side of the Chamber, together with the Senators upon this side who are opposed to it, to kill the treaty.

Mr. President, if that is true, why need we spend another hour here in delaying business which ought to be transacted? And that is the reason why, apparently, this time for the last two weeks has been utterly wasted. If it has not been for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not this treaty would be deposited if ratified, then that time has been wasted upon the other side just as much as it has been wasted upon this side. I had supposed that it was for that purpose; but, if it is not for that purpose, then there has been no purpose at all behind it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator refers to us as irreconcilables. An irreconcilable is one who will not compromise at all. We have offered two compromises upon this vital article. Does the Senator think that we should offer more than two at the same time? We have not even said that those were the only two that we would accept. We are willing to consider any compromise that may be offered from the other side on that article, but those two we are agreed upon among ourselves, if offered from the other side.

Mr. BORAH. You are willing to consider any reservation which may be offered except the reservation which has been adopted?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are willing to consider, as I have stated, any compromise of a radical difference on a vital matter for the purpose of meeting the popular demand for a ratification.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator willing to vote for a reservation which destroys the obligation covered by article 10 and make it depend entirely upon the action of Congress?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

Mr. BORAH. Well, then, that is the proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is one proposition. That is the irreconcilable proposition.

Mr. BORAH. No; that is not the irreconcilable proposition. These Senators over here say that they are opposed to article 10 so long as any part of the obligation is permitted to stand; that the execution of article 10 must be determined alone by Congress, but if there is an obligation left in it they are opposed to it; and they are just as much opposed to that as we are opposed to the treaty, according to their statement. Now, therefore, if you can not offer any reservation which maintains the obligation, you can not make any reservation which does not, and why continue this delay?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator from Idaho, an irreconcilable, authorized to speak for the mild reservationists?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am "an onlooker in Vienna."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope, then, that the Senator will not undertake to state anything except his construction of their position.

Mr. BORAH. I am taking it from what is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and what they have stated over and over again. The able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] stated just a few days ago that if there was any change in the substance of the reservation the treaty could not be ratified. If we are not fighting over substance, what are we fighting over? If there can be no change in substance, why delay voting upon the proposition? I am not undertaking to speak for these gentlemen. I am simply repeating what they have said many times here upon the floor, and I accept their statements.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think there is no one in the Senate who is personally more anxious than I am to bring this matter to a conclusion, for I have been occupied with it now for nearly a year.

Mr. President, we can hardly change now the course we have adopted, whether for good or for ill. I made a motion, to which the Senate agreed, to take up the reservation dealing with article 10 after the other 13 reservations had been disposed of. No motion to reconsider has been entered within the time stated by the rule, and I do not see how that order can be set aside except by unanimous consent. The quickest way to get to article 10 is to go straight on as we are going now.

I think the Senate will bear me witness that I have occupied, since this treaty has been up, very little time. I do not believe I have occupied an hour altogether. I have made no speeches. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has started a debate on every single reservation which has come up, on every point, no matter how trivial. If he wants to expedite matters, why should he not allow us to go to a vote, without starting a debate as each one comes along? I am willing to vote on these reservations, one after another, just as rapidly as we can do it.

One word as to the differences.

Mr. President, there are some Senators on this side who, as a matter of profound conviction, are not willing to vote for this treaty in any form. There are others here, a majority of the Senators on this side, who would be glad to ratify the treaty if the principles of the Lodge reservations are preserved, and who would not stand out on a mere question of phraseology. But on the principle involved in article 10—I think I am expressing the views of all of my colleagues—we do not propose to yield. We mean to get rid of any obligation under the second reservation, which covers article 10. We have not stood out against changes of phraseology, and do not now; but on the principle involved in article 10 we shall not yield, in my judgment, and I think I represent them all.

The Senator from Nebraska has never offered a compromise. He has offered two forms of reservation, which both yield and change the principle involved in the second reservation.

As to what the President may think, I do not know, and I do not think anybody else knows, and I have no means of informing myself; but that is our position here. If I could have my way I would vote on these reservations just as rapidly as possible. I think the quickest way is to finish those that remain, and, if the Senate wants to get quickly to the end and reach article 10, to stop debate on these unimportant reservations, and get there.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just to finish one topic that has been discussed, and do it in a moment, I want to call attention to the statements that have been made that the expenses of the League of Nations are going to be very small.

I think a man who will undertake to prophesy what these expenses may be has a great deal of temerity. I find, in reading the proceedings of the council of the League of Nations, some information which I think throws a little light on that question, and which indicates how far the council of the League of Nations is now proposing to go.

Señor Leon submitted to the executive council of the League of Nations the following conclusions:

"(a) To submit to the council proposals for the formation of a permanent organization, as part of the organization of the League of Nations, concerning communications and transits.

"(b) To prepare, for the submission to this organization, drafts of general international conventions with regard to transit, waterways, ports, and railways, if possible.

"(c) Provisionally, and until the organization has been formed, to advise on questions which the council may think fit to submit to it, and which fall within the jurisdiction of the League of Nations under the terms of article 23 of the covenant of the league, and of the articles in the various peace treaties relating to ports, waterways, and railways."

* * * * * * *

Señor Da Cunha submitted the following resolution:

"That in view of the duties imposed upon the league by article 23 (f) and article 25 the council invites the health commission, which has already met informally on the initiative of the British Government, to constitute a conference by adding to its members a small number of international health experts with an official of the league as secretary. The conference will prepare for submission to the council proposals concerning the institution of a permanent body, to whom the council can refer for advice and, if necessary, for action all questions connected with the execution of the above-mentioned articles."

Again it is recited that the following propositions are under consideration, and Mr. Balfour, in this connection, speaks:

The council of the League of Nations shall convene an international conference, with a view to studying the financial crisis and to look for the means of remedying it and of litigating the dangerous consequences arising from it.

A commission composed of members of the council nominated by the President is instructed to summon the States chiefly concerned to this conference to convene it at the earliest possible date.

In addition to that, Mr. President, it is recited that they have under consideration the Danzig question; the organization of a permanent court of international justice. They have a committee on transportation, ports, waterways, railways, and duties of the league in connection therewith. They also have one on health, international health, and one on the Polish minority treaty.

So we find already the council of the League of Nations taking up questions that are world-wide that do not relate to the settlement of war controversies or to the making for general conditions of peace, but are of that character of duty which is assumed alone by governments. That body, operating without any constitution or any restraining power, within the first two or three of its meetings, is undertaking questions which involve a control, for instance, of international sanitation and health. If you ever started a movemet of that kind, there is no telling how many billions of dollars it would cost.

Moreover, it has been suggested time and again that the League of Nations shall itself become the mandatory in Turkey. It has been suggested that it become the mandatory in Armenia. It has been suggested that there shall be placed under the League of Nations Fiume and other countries. Mr. President, when we embark upon this field we may as well prepare for the expenditure of sums of money which are now incalculable. That this will be the course of the League of Nations no man who has studied its proceedings from day to day can possibly doubt.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has just called my attention to article 399 of the treaty, which expressly provides that—of the international labor office and of the meetings of the conference or governing body shall be paid to the director by the secretary general of the League of Nations out of the general funds of the league.

All the other expenses—

A few having been omitted—

How many men will constitute that organization, an organization that is authorized to inquire into labor conditions in all countries of the world? Our Labor Department here, operating under the immediate surveillance of Congress, has to-day a swarm of agents that cover this land, and you can find some of them in almost every hamlet and village of the country.

I venture the prediction—and with this I shall conclude what I have to say—that it will not be six months after the League of Nations is fully formed, if they get us in, before they will be calling for an international police force, which means an international army and an international navy, and that they will be udertaking the government of large sections of the world. Let us see if I am not warranted in making that statement.

The Austrian treaty, which is now before the Senate, expressly provides that Austria shall grant and maintain civil and religious liberty to all the people within her borders; that she shall grant equality of opportunity to all nationals within her borders; that she shall grant equal school facilities, and that certain nationals shall be entitled to conduct schools in their own language. It may be that every one of those suggestions is a good one if carried out, but the carrying out of them constitutes all there is of civil government. All there is to the Government of the United States is the guaranty of civil and religious liberty and of equal opportunity before the law and the protection of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness. All that is guaranteed now or written into the Austrian treaty, and then it is provided that any violation by Austria or any failure on the part of Austria to strictly comply with those conditions shall be an international question. Thus the internal government of Austria is made an international question.

Then it is further provided that a majority of the council of the League of Nations shall determine these questions. The unanimous vote has disappeared; the majority vote takes its place. Now, what have you done? To all intents and purposes you have placed the complete supervision of the Government of Austria under the League of Nations, and every failure of the Government of Austria to provide equality of right and opportunity and to provide for the civil and religious liberty of her people is at once justiciable by the League of Nations. In other words, it becomes the supreme governing body of Austria. Thus there is brought within the direct supervision and control of the council of the League of Nations a supergovernment over all the internal affairs of what is left of Austria.

But in addition to that the treaty with Jugo-Slavia contains similar provisions, the treaty with Poland contains similar provisions, the treaty with Roumania contains similar provisions, and the treaty with Serbia contains similar provisions. I do not know yet, and I question whether anybody else knows, exactly how many people are in those several countries, but, as I understand it, there will be in the aggregate in all the countries not less than 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 people.

Thus the government of over forty or fifty million people is, in the last analysis, placed within the control of the council of the League of Nations, and in order to carry on that supergovernment it will be necessary to have machinery, it will be necessary to have an enormous force, and it will probably be very necessary in the immediate future to have, subject to the jurisdiction of the council of the League of Nations, a military force sufficient to maintain order and peace and to enforce the mandates of the league council.

As I have stated, it has also been proposed and discussed to put Turkey under a mandate of the league. Whether it is being carried out we can not tell, for we do not know what is in the minds of the four or five men who are now running the world, just as much as the Roman triumvirate ran the world, except America, and they are too influential here. We do not know what they may do with Turkey, but it is seriously proposed to put Turkey under a mandate of the League of Nations. If that is done, if the morning papers are to be credited, it will not be long before there will have to be an international force in Turkey. Indeed, Mr. Balfour, I believe it was, a few days ago, in speaking of the budget submitted to the British Parliament, stated that one item was for the policing and the control of Turkey, and he said that burden would rest upon the British Government until such time as it might be taken over by the League of Nations, clearly showing what was in the mind of that great British statesman; and Mr. Balfour will have his way in the end.

So when anyone gets up here and talks about it as being ridiculous and absurd to say that we are involving ourselves morally under this treaty for enormous expenditures, I think he is the one who is engaging in the very doubtful work of speculating as to the future. To talk about an organization that is great enough in its strength and might to control the majority of the human family, and to do it without the expenditure of money, seems to me to be the last word in absurdity.

The majority of the human family, and a vast majority of the human family, are to be held under a state of tutelage and control after the league is formed, just as a majority of them are now held to a greater or less extent under the control of other powers. The serfs of India will still be serfs, controlled it is true directly by Great Britain, but all the vast territory that has been gathered in will either go under the direct control of some government or it will be brought under the control of the league. If the league carries out the functions it professes that it will carry out, of producing equality and justice and right in the world, then the league must undertake to break the chains of all those countries, whether they are riveted on by Great Britain, by France, or by whatsoever country which may have been engaged in that kind of business.

So you have here a question not of peccadillos and of a few dollars, but you have a question that may involve this country in billions of expense. Nobody can tell; power grows and feeds upon itself; and already the League of Nations council has embarked on seas that we were told would never be entered.

Mr. President, I think, therefore, that this is not a small question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the ninth reservation as amended.

Mr. CURTIS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the pending reservation, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to the expenses of the League of Nations or of any official thereof or of any organization or commission thereunder unless and until Congress shall have by appropriate legislation provided therefor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the important difference, if there is any, between the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the substitute which I have just offered grows out of this language. The reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts provides:

That the United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations—

And so forth—

unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States.

That would imply, as I read it, that if officials were functioning under authorizations theretofore given, as soon as the appropriations ceased or had been expended then they would have to cease that function; they could no longer discharge their duties.

My substitute provides that if a law shall be enacted creating these organizations, and which authorizes, of course, the expenditure of money, they may proceed regardless of the fact that the appropriation has not been made. Senators can easily conjecture that commissions and individuals may rightfully be performing duties enjoined by the league and the appropriation may be limited, and yet it be understood and desired that their functions and labors shall continue beyond the period of the appropriations. It seems to me that if by law we provide for organizations and for individuals to discharge duties the law itself would impose the obligation of providing for the appropriation, and they could continue to function, notwithstanding the appropriation had been exhausted.

So it appears to me that the limitation expressed in the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is too severe and is improper and that a reservation which merely provides that these functions shall be continued and these duties performed under general law is all that we should impose in a reservation.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is quite right in his interpretation. The precise object of the reservation is to prevent officers of the United States from incurring deficits. I ask for a vote on the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to reservation No. 9.

The substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to reservation No. 9 as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that if my pair, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], were present he would support this reservation. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and its transfer to my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to anounce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. If present, he would vote "yea." He is paired by transfer with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Announcing my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER. I announce my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. Being unable to secure a transfer of the pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] are absent on public business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 25, as follows:

So reservation No. 9, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, as amended was agreed to, as follows:

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share of the expenses of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon reservation No. 10, which the Secretary will read.

The Reading Clerk read reservation No. 10, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

10. If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a word in explanation of my vote on the reservation. Like a great many others, I can see no reason whatever for the reservation. Under the plan proposed by the covenant, if the council proposes a plan of disarmament it must be approved by the various nations; and, if it is approved, thereafter armaments can not be increased by the nations without the consent of the council. So, whatever plan is proposed by the council, it does not become binding upon the United States until that plan is accepted by the United States; and it can be accepted by the United States only by virtue of an act of Congress. When the question comes up upon the acceptance of the plan proposed, if it does not provide that the United States may increase its armament in case it shall be at war, and the policy of the United States is against that at that time, of course they will reject the plan of disarmament proposed. So the whole matter remains in the hands of Congress, regardless of this reservation.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk, as a substitute for the reservation just read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Indiana.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, the substitute I have offered emanates from that much-discussed and frequently criticized gathering known as the bipartisan committee, of which I happened to be a member. It has several times been referred to as a self-constituted committee. So far as I am concerned—and I think the same thing can be said of all others who served on that committee, at least from this side of the Chamber—there was nothing self-constituted about it. I was invited to act as a member of that committee by the leader of the Republican side and was assured that my membership on it had been submitted to and discussd by at least several Senators on this side of the Chamber, including some of the so-called irreconcilable group. With much reluctance I accepted and agreed to serve. I say with reluctance, because I had previously conceived and previously announced convictions concerning the essential features of this pact which were of such a character as led me to doubt very gravely whether I could ever reach an agreement with others whom I understood were to constitute the personnel of the committee. Some of them—in fact, all of them—had expressed their views, and they were in some instances so diametrically opposed to my own that I very gravely doubted whether we could reach any agreement whatever. But, Mr. President, having agreed to serve on that committee, I went into it in good faith. As to the essential features of the reservations, I am of the opinion now that I was several months ago when I announced my convictions on the floor of the Senate. To any alteration of them I do not, did not, and can not agree; but, Mr. President, there were some changes to which I did agree, and to the things to which I agreed I will adhere. I shall have no apology to offer for bad faith on my part, and I shall accept none from others who participated with me at any time in any conference.

The purpose of the substitute is so obvious that I myself do not care to say anything about it. It speaks for itself. If anyone else has views to express concerning it, he is at liberty so to do, but I shall not take up the time of the Senate with a discussion or an explanation of anything which upon its face is so plain as I think the proposed substitute is.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him for a word of explanation of his substitute. It appears to me that it might serve as a preface to the reservation as it originally stood, or as a supplement to it, but as a substitute therefor it certainly does not cover the ground covered by original reservation No. 10. If the Congress of the United States accepts a limitation of armaments as proposed by the council of the league, and thereafter the United States shall be threatened by war, it will be bound by the limitations proposed by the council and theretofore accepted, will it not?

Mr. NEW. I think so; but, Mr. President, if the substitute is unsatisfactory to the Senator from Illinois, I am perfectly willing that he shall offer an amendment to it. It is a matter of indifference to me under the circumstances whether or not it is adopted. I agreed to it in the conference, and, having agreed to it, I offer it.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think the Senator ought to explain whether he thinks it falls short of original reservation No. 10 in providing for freedom of action by the Congress to arm the country in the event of future danger; and if it does not fall short, I think he ought to explain why he thinks it does not.

Mr. NEW. I do not think it falls materially short of the original reservation. I am ready and willing to vote for it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana, if I understood him correctly, stated that the proposed substitute offered by him was agreed to in the conference. Is he able to state whether or not it was unanimously agreed to?

Mr. NEW. I think I can; I remember that no objection was expressed at the time. When I say "agreed to," Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to make clear exactly what I mean by that. It was distinctly understood among those who participated in the conference that their agreement bound nobody else to anything; that an agreement amongst themselves meant simply this, and nothing more: That they would recommend to their colleagues on this floor that the substitutions for the reservations presented from the Foreign Relations Committee should be accepted. That was as far as they were to go. They assumed no authority whatever; they recognized that they had none. It was merely, as I have said, so far as I was concerned—and I think I can say as much, in fact, I know I can, for those who served on that committee at least from this side of the Chamber—it was a good-faith effort to reach an agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I was moved to ask the question by the fact that the Senator had used the language that it was the agreement of the compromise conference committee, and I thought it was pertinent to ascertain exactly what that meant, because, as I had understood from some statements made, I think, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] the other day, the word "agreement" should be taken in a special sense; that such understandings or agreements as were arrived at by the members of that conference were only tentative, and only in the event that they made an agreement and dissolved peacefully, so to speak, were they to be bound by the agreement, and then only to the extent of recommending; but that inasmuch as they had broken up by a failure to agree upon article 10 and the Monroe doctrine, therefore he did not consider that there was even a tentative agreement amongst them, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated, the whole thing fell by the wayside. So that whatever the intention of the members of this conference may have been if they had ultimately gotten together and agreed to go out and recommend to their respective factions in the Chamber here the adoption of their views, there was in fact no agreement to recommend anything. That is as I understand it. I do not know whether that is the way the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] understands it or not.

So much for that, Mr. President. Coming now to the original reservation, it has already been stated by the Secretary; but, inasmuch as I desire to contrast it with the modification presented by the Senator from Indiana, I will take the liberty of reading it again. It reads as follows:

> If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Now, if I may be pardoned for saying so, the substitute or modification offered by the Senator from Indiana does not seem to me to be germane to that reservation at all. The substitute provides as follows:

> No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress.

There is nothing whatever there about the right of this country to increase its armaments in case of invasion or in case of threatened war. In fact, the language offered by the Senator from Indiana, if I am able to get the right idea of it, is, in effect, exactly the terms of the present treaty, unmodified.

The treaty provides, in article 8, as follows:

> The council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.
>
> Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every 10 years.
> After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

It was to the latter paragraph that the original Lodge reservation was germane, and the purpose of that reservation was to take us out of the provision of the treaty which provided that when we had accepted the plan of the council for a reduction, the limit so fixed should not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] states that in his opinion this reservation is entirely unnecessary, because when the council suggests a plan for disarmament, if Congress does not like the provision in the plan, it need not accept it. But the plan which may be suggested by the council may contain no provisions at all as to exceeding the limits fixed by the council, or anything else of that kind. The plan presented by the council may not treat at all of the questions which the treaty itself discusses. The word "plan" is a very vague word. They may say in their plan that it is recommended that each nation reduce its Navy by 10 per cent as measured in tonnage, or its troops by a certain number, measured in numbers, or its artillery, its guns, by such a number, or measured in any other way, and say nothing more, in which case the treaty provision applies. So it seems to me that if this country wants to preserve the right to increase its fleet or its Army in view of war or invasion to arise in the future, without going to the council as a suppliant for permission so to do, now is the time to say so; but, as I say, the substitute proposed by the Senator from Indiana is simply a return to the treaty without any reservation whatever.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not understand the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana as does the Senator from Connecticut. I take it that the object of any reservation on this subject is to give the United States some controlling voice in reference to its own armaments. I also take it that one of the most essential things to be done in the world looking to peace is the control of armaments. Now, if this provision is to the effect that no limitation of armaments that may be adopted shall be binding upon the United States unless and until it is approved by the Congress, why have we not obtained all that we are seeking to obtain in having any reservation at all on this subject, finally giving the United States Congress the right to approve or disapprove before it is bound by the action of the council?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For the reason that a certain pacifist Congress, if you please—if we shall ever be cursed with one again—might adopt some plan proposed by a pacifist council of the League of Nations, and then we might regret it at the next session of Congress, and the country might be confronted with an entirely different situation than it was confronted with when the previous Congress had accepted the plan recommended by the council, in which case this great, sovereign Nation would have lost its ability to defend itself, and would have to go hat in hand to Geneva to get the permission of 8 or 10 foreign Governments—our rivals, and possibly our secret enemies—before we could build another battleship or add a regiment of troops to our Army. Those who drew the original reservation, seeing that danger, put in the reservation so that if we were threatened with invasion or in time of war we need not humiliate ourselves by going to this international concern and getting their permission to increase our defense.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think there is some misunderstanding about this reservation.

In the first place, ordinarily the President and the Senate may enter into a treaty limiting armaments. To be sure, Congress can violate the treaty and increase the armaments at any time it sees fit, as it can violate or abrogate any treaty; but, ordinarily, if we were going to enter into an agreement limiting armaments, it would be done by a treaty. It must be done by a treaty between nations.

A hundred years ago we entered into an agreement with Great Britain limiting armaments upon the Great Lakes. To be sure, the treaty took the form of an exchange of notes, but those notes were ratified by the Senate of the United States and that treaty has been lived up to, and I have no doubt whatever that under the treaty-making power the President and the Senate may enter into such a treaty.

Mr. LODGE. But in the case of such a treaty, of course, we could put in any conditions we chose.

Mr. KELLOGG. Any conditions we chose. Now, if an agreement should be reached in the league, and it should be proposed to the several Governments for ratification, this Government could attach any conditions or reservations it saw fit, just exactly as we are attaching conditions and reservations to this treaty.

There was some doubt in the minds of some Senators as to whether the several Governments ratifying the proposal of the league would act through the treaty-making power or act through their legislative bodies. I think, ordinarily, the Governments would act through the treaty-making power; but to remove that doubt this reservation was proposed and has been submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], making it clear that the representative of this Government must be the Congress of the United States instead of the treaty-making power, to wit, the President and the Senate.

If the President and the Senate, when they accepted such a treaty, could amend it or place a reservation upon it which provided that we could increase our armaments at any time during hostilities or under the threat of invasion, the Congress can do it when it ratifies the agreement, or the Congress can say, "The United States will not reduce its armaments to the extent that the League of Nations has recommended; it will reduce the Army but not the Navy." It is entirely, then, I believe, in the hands of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. I regard this as a vitally important question, and I am anxious to get the Senator's view. Will he allow me to state my case just in a word?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will.

Mr. REED. Article 8 reads in part as follows:

> After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

If these plans can be adopted by the President without the concurrence of Congress, then the moment he would accept the obligation of article 8 would attach, of course. If the plans can be adopted by the President and the Senate conjointly, the moment they agree the article becomes binding. If the plans are accepted by the council, the moment they agree the article becomes binding and it is a completed contract. Would not that be the case?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now, if the Senator will allow me to proceed to the next proposition, we then have a binding contract. Whether it is made by the President, or by the President and the Senate, or by the President and the Congress, we have agreed to this treaty proposition, and the treaty proposition is that having been adopted the limit of armament can not be exceeded thereafter without concurrence of the council.

Is it not plain to the Senator as a lawyer that if we want to reserve our right to increase armament without the consent of the council under particular conditions, we must write it into the act of acceptance or we must write it into this treaty, reserving to ourselves the right to attach conditions in the acceptance?

Mr. KELLOGG. We can either put that condition on now or we can put it on when we accept the treaty which limits the armament.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator why we should not do it now?

Mr. KELLOGG. Because it seems wise, and I think it is wise, to leave it to Congress to decide that question at the time when the armament agreement comes up.

Mr. REED. Now——

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me proceed. I want to answer the Senator completely. I will assume that the league proposes a limitation of armaments, providing that the United States shall have a certain army and a certain navy, and saying nothing about increasing it. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that that restriction applies—and I am speaking of the restriction in article 8—after war is declared or we get into war or are threatened with invasion, if the council proposed a treaty limiting our armament, and we accepted it, of course article 8 of the treaty would apply; but when that is proposed to us the President and the Senate or the Congress, whichever acts, can say, "We accept the treaty on the condition that our armament shall remain in time of peace as suggested by the council, but in case of threatened invasion or war we reserve the right to increase our armament as we please." We can either do it now, or Congress can do it then.

Mr. REED. I put this to the Senator as a lawyer, and he has a very distinguished and merited reputation as a lawyer. We are now making a primary contract. We are now making a treaty. In this treaty we agree to the policy of disarmament. In this treaty we agree that the council shall prepare a plan of disarmament. Suppose the council does prepare the plans and fixes the size of the Army of the United States at 100,000.

We come now to the third step. We are to agree to that recommendation. Is it certain that at that time we have any option left, under this treaty which is already made, except either to accept or reject? The treaty is a concluded thing. Let us assume that there might be a doubt about it and that there might be a question raised. If the Senator were drawing this contract for one of his own clients, would he not put in at this time some appropriate language to show that he reserved to his client at the time of acceptance the right to attach conditions?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think that we have the perfect right, when this proposed treaty limiting armament is sent to the Congress, to ratify it or refuse to ratify it except with amendments and conditions, and if I were to be one of the Congress at that time I should want other conditions than are proposed by the first reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KELLOGG. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator.

This reservation as it was proposed simply provides that in the case of threatened invasion or when we are engaged in war we reserve the right to increase our armament. I think there is another reservation that Congress would want to put on at the time. Suppose we agreed with the great powers of Europe—England, France, and Italy—limiting armaments, and the South American countries were not parties to it or Japan was not a party to it; although none of those countries were engaged in war with us or threatened invasion of our territory, we might write a reservation that if other countries increased their armament we should have a right to do it, notwithstanding the agreement of the league. So if you are seeking complete protection, we are not getting it by the first reservation any more than we are by the one proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], for I believe that the Congress may impose any conditions it sees fit or refuse to ratify the agreement.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Montana will pardon me, I will yield to the Senator from Illinois for just a moment.

Mr. McCORMICK. I asked some time ago permission of the Senator from Minnesota to interject, merely in order that I might have an amendment read, because I think it bears upon his very illuminating argument. It is an amendment which I propose to add to the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Montana will bear with me while it is read, I will then yield to him.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be printed and lie on the table.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Illinois proposes to add at the end of the proposed substitute of the Senator from Indiana the following words:

> And the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Mr. KELLOGG. I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to say in connection with the inquiry addressed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], there can be no question at all, when the plan is proposed by the council, that it may be either adopted or rejected by the Government of the United States, and if it may be rejected absolutely by the Government of the United States, of course it may be accepted conditionally; that is to say, under the settled rule of contracts an acceptance with conditions amounts to a rejection. That is to say, we say to the council that we reject the plan, but if they will modify it so that it shall provide that the Government of the United States may increase its armament in time of war or whenever it is threatened with invasion, we will then accept and adopt the plan. So when the right is reserved to reject absolutely, as a matter of course that includes the right to accept upon conditions, and if the conditions are acceded to, then there is an acceptance; otherwise there is a rejection.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Minnesota indulge me to ask the Senator from Montana a question on what he has just been saying?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri for that purpose.

Mr. REED. That is the view of the Senator from Montana, and it might be accepted as correct, but in view of the fact that it is his view, considering the importance of this contract would he not be willing to have this provision modified by adding appropriate words, making it plain that we reserve that right?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I object to this reservation, because the one thing that I hope for out of this covenant for a League of Nations is that it may result in the reduction of armament, so that our Nation, as well as all the sovereign nations of the world, will be relieved from the awful burden that military armament after this time will impose upon those who are obliged to maintain it; and I fear that any reservation of this character will be an obstacle in the way of securing even the proposal of a plan of disarmament or of the reduction of armament.

Why should this Government be endeavoring to throw obstacles in the way by saying that we are going to impose conditions in advance? Let us get the proposal for disarmament, invite it in any form, and then let us act on it when it comes.

Mr. REED. But the Senator states——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I wish to take only a moment further, and then I shall be through.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I said, if we must adopt now all the conditions that we wish to attach to a treaty limiting armaments or all the amendments that we would place on such a treaty, we have not succeeded in doing it in this reservation to article 10, because countries not parties to the treaty might be so increasing their armaments as to make it necessary for the United States to increase its armament, although nations parties to the League of Nations or parties to the agreement limiting armaments might not be increasing theirs.

Mr. President, all I wish is to have it provided that any agreement which comes to this Government to be ratified shall be passed on by the Congress, and then attach such conditions as we may believe at the time to be necessary to protect this country. I realize that a world agreement limiting armaments is probably far off. I remember only a few months ago one of the principal English statesmen in the House of Lords said that it was a dream which would not be realized in many years. But is it possible that all the great nations must go on competing with each other in the increase of the burdens of armament? If it is true, then there is no limit to the expenditures of this Government or the other Governments of the world. I hope that the time will come when there may be some reasonable agreement limiting the armaments of the principal nations of the world.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just one word. The sole difference between the reservation offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and the treaty itself is that under the provision offered by the Senator from Indiana it is made plain that the acceptance by the American Government can not be made by the President alone or by the President and the Senate alone, but it must be made by the Congress of the United States. Outside of that difference, none other can be discovered. That does not reach the heart of the Lodge reservation, but cuts that out. The heart of the Lodge reservation is to be found in the words that the United States "reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war."

If those words are left out of the amendment to the Lodge reservation, then you are back exactly where you started, except that you have made it clear that the act of acceptance must be by the Congress instead of by the Executive. If those words were necessary in the first instance, they are just as necessary now, because even if the President were to possess the power to agree to disarmament and fix the size of our Army, he could attach conditions in his agreement, just as the Congress, according to the argument which has been made, can attach conditions when it agrees.

The whole question is, Are we going to sign an agreement providing that the council of the League of Nations shall present a plan, and that when we once agree to that plan we can not thereafter increase our Army, even though our coast is invaded, our cities attacked, and our people murdered, until we first go and get the unanimous consent of eight foreign gentlemen in Geneva?

If this reservation is to be adopted at all, it ought to mean something. If it be true, as argued by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who frankly says he is against any reservation, that we will possess the right at the time we agree to the plan of disarmament to then write in a provision reserving to ourselves the right to increase the size of our Army, non obstante the express words of the treaty, then let us say so now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. So that when we come to deliver the treaty we give notice that any acceptance made is subject to conditions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remind the Senator that we do not even attach a reservation. We can reject the plan unless the plan provides just exactly what the Senator wants.

Mr. REED. That is true. The Senator, however, agrees that the only way we can get a reservation of power to ourselves after having signed the treaty is by exercising the power of absolute rejection and then saying we will accept upon certain specified conditions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will remember, in the first place, that we are represented upon the council which prepares the plan. If the Government of the United States want to reserve that right, of course their representative will see that that goes into the plan; but if he does not wish that it shall go into the plan, it comes before the Congress of the United States for adoption or rejection, and if it is not in the plan the Congress will reject it, or it will say, "We will approve it simply on condition that it is changed."

Mr. REED. Why not say so now? Why this temerity about asserting the right now in unequivocal terms before we make the contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We shall have the right then.

Mr. REED. Well, we do not know whether we shall have it or not. The Senator says that the United States will be represented on the council. I do not want to prolong the debate now, but I shall have something to say about this question in future. The United States will have one man on the council to speak for the whole 110,000,000 people of the United States. He may be as utterly incompetent to protect this people as some other men have been incompetent to protect us in the past. One of the eternal and fundamental vices of this document is that it places practically all of the foreign relations and business of the United States in the hands of one man. That is contrary to the spirit of our Government; it is contrary to every idea of democracy; it is contrary to the principles of free government to place the fate of a nation in the hands of one man. All we need to do to suffer under this arrangement is to have one man there who is incompetent properly to protect us. The question does come back to Congress; that is true; but I am discussing the statement that we shall be protected because there is one individual—John Jones or John House or somebody else—sitting over there. When we come to the action of Congress to protect us, I do not want Congress to be placed in a position where it is not clear it has a right to attach any condition that it sees fit. That is one of the great questions in this league. The man who can for a moment cavil about the United States reserving the right to raise an army at any time it sees fit to defend its coast is not an American citizen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] for the pending reservation.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ESTOPINAL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as in legislative session, at the request of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], I ask unanimous consent that the arrangement for memorial addresses in the Senate Chamber for to-morrow upon the late Representative ESTOPINAL, of Louisiana, may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 8, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 6, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, humbly and reverently we bow in Thy presence and acknowledge with gratitude our indebtedness to Thee for all that we are and all that we hope to be. Pour down upon us, we beseech Thee, Thy spiritual gifts, and grant us every blessing which purifies, ennobles, exalts, that we may fulfill our duty to Thee and to our fellow men. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. There seems to be some hesitation on the part of gentlemen in control.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 244 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Under the rule adopted yesterday the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Report No. 637. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Report No. 637, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Report No. 637, under the rule the Chair recognizes for two hours the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEE. Was the gentleman selected to preside over the Committee of the Whole because it is his birthday on the 6th day of March? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. I thank the gentlemen for their courtesy. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there will be but two speeches on this side under the two hours allowed me; and I might suggest to my colleague from California [Mr. LEA] that I will yield first to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE], and then I would like to have the gentleman from California yield all of his time, because there will be only one speech following, by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], if that is satisfactory. I yield, Mr. Chairman, 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee on aviation has taken a large amount of testimony during its investigations. We have briefly reviewed the same in our report submitted to the House. The hearings should be referred to for detailed information. In my limited time I can only comment upon some of the material facts testified to by witnesses who appeared before the committee. I have no intention of injecting into my remarks any personalities, nor any personal views. What I say will be based upon the record submitted to you as a result of our work. You can draw your own conclusions from the facts presented. I have no personal feeling in the matter and no desire to injure any person, but I refuse to be a party to any whitewash [applause], and in the public interest and for our future national welfare and security take the position that the House and the country are entitled to have the facts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am sure that the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin, concurs with me in this view. In the investigation he has been an indefatigable worker in ascertaining what the expenditures of the Government were in the Aircraft Service during the war and for what purposes they were made, and he is entitled to general commendation for the great public service which he has rendered. [Applause on the Republican side.] I desire to give him as much of the time allotted under the rule as possible, because it is his due. Therefore in my brief remarks I would respectfully ask that Members refrain from interrupting me with requests to yield.

Prior to our entry into the World War no preparations had been made for an efficient air service. The subject was new to America. Those placed in authority were wholly without experience in aeronautics, and stumbled along, committing one blunder after another, until the country became aroused and demanded investigations. One of these inquiries was conducted by the Department of Justice, under the able direction of Judge Hughes. An exhaustive report was submitted showing conclusively that large appropriations made by the Congress had been expended under a régime of inefficiency, waste, extravagance, and fraud.

An additional inquiry was made by the Senate under the Thomas committee, which submitted a report showing how utterly helpless the Government had been in the production of aircraft. These two comprehensive, nonpartisan reports are a matter of history and show how approximately a billion of dollars was expended without commendable results.

The total amount expended by the United States in our aircraft program from April, 1917, to the date of the armistice was, in round figures, $1,051,000,000. We did not produce a fighting plane; we did not produce a purely bombing plane; we produced and sent to the front in France for operation, beginning in early August, 1918, and continuing to November 11, 1918, 213 De Haviland 4's, which were observation planes and might be used for light day bombing. The De Haviland 4 was an awkward and dangerous machine of English pattern, which we copied and to which we fitted the Liberty motor, the only achievement of merit of the American Air Service in the United States.

During the war the British produced 27 types of one-seat fighting planes, 5 types of two seaters, 20 types of observation planes, 10 types of day bombers, and 10 types of night bombers; the French 31 types of one-seat fighting planes, 10 types of two seaters, 22 types of observation planes, 7 types of day bombers, and 4 types of night bombers; the Italians 13 types of one-seat fighting planes, 1 type of two seater, 11 types of observation planes, 4 types of day bombers, and 7 types of night bombers; the Germans 12 types of one-seat fighting planes, 3 types of two seaters, 10 types of observation planes—I have no figures on day bombers—and 6 types of night bombers. The United States during the war did not produce a single type of any kind of airplane, unless we call the production of the copy of the De Haviland 4 a type.

However, with this indisputable record before them, those who were responsible for our failure and national humiliation and their partisan apologists and defenders insist upon asserting to the American people and hypocritically attempting to prove to them that the Aircraft Service in the United States during the war was efficient, successful, and worthy of public commendation. I make no comment, except to urge that we who know the facts should take immediate steps to put aeronautics in this country upon a sound and healthful foundation for such growth and progress as shall be deemed sufficient to protect fully the property and lives of the American people.

There was an additional investigation demanded by the loggers and lumbermen of the Northwest. This demand arose out of the incorporation and operation of the Siems-Carey-H. S. Kerbaugh Corporation, which had offices at No. 50 Church Street, New York City, and was incorporated under the laws of the State of Maine. In the spring of 1918 this corporation received from the War Department two important contracts—one a purely cost-plus contract to build a railroad from some point on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad in the State of Washington to the Olympic timber tract in the vicinity of Lake Pleasant, and the other, a most liberal contract that became a cost-plus contract upon the signing of the armistice, to get spruce flitches from such timber tract and involving an estimated expenditure of $23,000,000. These two contracts were twin sisters, interdependent, and one wholly useless without the other.

On April 24, 1918, the appointment of Mr. John D. Ryan as chairman of the Aircraft Board was announced. This appointment was confirmed May 10, 1918. On May 21 the Bureau of Aircraft Production was created, and Mr. Ryan, who had served as chairman of the Aircraft Board from the date of such confirmation, became director of the Bureau of Aircraft Production. Mr. Ryan, in reference to his appointment, testified:

I did not actually take charge until April 26. As I stated on yesterday, I did not sit on the Aircraft Board except as a spectator, or as an auditor, rather, until I was confirmed, which was some time early in May. And I did not take office as director of aircraft production until the office was created on May 21. So that I was without authority until the early part of May.

He declined to sign the railroad contract upon the ground that it would be improper for him to do so by reason of his connections with the Milwaukee Railroad. Thereupon the Secretary of War directed Assistant Secretary of War Stettinius to sign this contract, which he did on May 18, 1918.

The spruce contract Mr. Ryan approved on May 28, 1918. Mr. Ryan carried on the execution of both contracts until they were terminated soon after the signing of the armistice. It is difficult to see how Mr. Ryan could properly supervise the execution of a railroad contract that he could not sign without committing an improper act; and it is clearly apparent that, if it was improper for him to sign the railroad contract, it was equally improper for him to sign the spruce contract, involving an estimated expenditure of nearly six times as much money as the cost of executing the railroad contract, and from the operations under which in the transporting of lumber the Milwaukee would be a direct beneficiary.

At this time the western terminus of the Milwaukee Railroad in the State of Washington was about 30 miles west from Port Angeles at Deep Creek, a point approximately 25 miles from Lake Pleasant to the southwest. A reference to the map will make the location of the different points entirely clear. In order to get spruce from the Olympic tract about Lake Pleasant, Col. Disque, who was in charge of operations for the War Department in the Northwest, had in the spring of 1918 recommended to the Secretary of War the extension of the Milwaukee Railroad from Deep Creek.

On March 20, 1918, he sent to the Secretary of War this telegram:

Distance necessary to open this line, Lake Crescent route, to reach large spruce tracts double that necessary by the Milwaukee Deep Creek route. Will not go through railway facilities beyond Port Angeles. This line seems an unnecessary expenditure, and everybody interested in it wishes Government to bear proportion of expense considerably greater than Government would have to bear in extending Milwaukee. Milwaukee has been driving their road west slowly to meet development of country and are now within 30 miles west of Port Angeles. Milwaukee being common carrier equipped to advance their own line over their surveyed road unquestionably best means of entering Clallam spruce. In this opinion I have support of most experienced operators in this section.

By Clallam spruce is meant spruce in the Olympic tract in Clallam County.

On April 8, 1918, Col. Disque sent a communication to the Secretary of War, which contained this statement:

It will be noted that the Milwaukee extension Deep Creek route will immediately tap large stands of spruce timber between Deep Creek and Pysht River, whereas the proposed Crescent Lake Railroad must be extended its full length before any spruce will be available. Furthermore, it is regarded by many excellent engineers as a very difficult problem to lay rail along either the north or south bank of Crescent Lake, and those best equipped to discuss the problem state that the only practicable means of using this line would be to ferry cars or product across Lake Crescent and connect with the Milwaukee near Port Angeles.

On April 24, 1918, the Secretary of War sent a communication to Mr. McAdoo, Director General of the United States Railroad Administration, in which he states:

A virgin stand has been located in the northwestern part of the State of Washington sufficient to meet the necessities of the next two or three years. The nearest railroad is the branch of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul running west from Port Angeles. This branch now terminates at Deep Creek. The question of a railroad to reach this timber has been carefully considered, and it is the unanimous opinion of the Pacific coast committee of the Aircraft Board that the best solution of the question is the extension of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway from Deep Creek to Forks. This extension is included in the plans for the future development of the Milwaukee, and the route has all been surveyed. It is the opinion of the War Department that this railroad should be built.

On the evening of June 3, 1918, Col. Disque, after wabbling and wasting 40 days, the most suitable period of the year for construction work in the State of Washington, reversed the decision of the Secretary of War and determined that the railroad should be built from Joyce Junction, on the Milwaukee Railroad, 15 miles west of Port Angeles, to Crescent Lake, then on the north side of the lake along the side of the Olympic Mountain Range and on to Lake Pleasant, a distance of 36 miles, and reaching no spruce for 30 miles.

In this connection the important question is, Who caused Col. Disque to change his mind? He testified that Mr. Byram, president of the Milwaukee Railroad, resolved the doubt in his mind in favor of the Lake Crescent route. After Mr. Byram, upon the witness stand in New York City, vigorously stated that he had always been in favor of the extension of the Milwaukee road from Deep Creek, as approved by the Secretary of War, Col. Disque, in his later testimony in the city of Washington, relieved Mr. Byram from all responsibility in the determination of the route.

A review of the evidence discloses that the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation was determined from the start that the railroad should be built as finally located by Col. Disque. Messrs. Carey and Kerbaugh visited the State of Washington early in April, 1918, and while there went to Port Angeles, and then by automobile to Lake Crescent and crossed Lake Crescent on a small steamer. Mr. Kerbaugh testified that within about two hours after leaving Port Angeles, and while riding in the steamer on Lake Crescent, he located the route of the railroad where it was finally built. This is remarkable testimony, in view of the fact that he had never been in this locality before. Mr. Carey was as firmly determined as Mr. Kerbaugh that the railroad should be built via Crescent Lake.

Mr. Kerbaugh further testified that on April 12, 1918, at Portland, Oreg., when Mr. Carey and himself indicated to Col. Disque that they favored the Lake Crescent route, Col. Disque stated to them that it would be ninety-nine chances out of one hundred that it would be the Deep Creek route. He further testified that Col. Disque continued to be of that opinion until about the time of the signing of the railroad contract.

Messrs. Carey and Kerbaugh returned to the East in April, 1918, and were followed shortly afterwards by Col. Disque. On May 18, 1918, when the three were in the city of Washington, the railroad contract was executed. The most amazing thing in this contract is that it is silent as to the railroad route. While Col. Disque assumed to locate the route and testified that he did locate it on June 3, 1918, he had no authority under the contract to do so. The contract provides:

ARTICLE 1. The contractor, if requested in writing within 20 days from the date hereof by the officer in charge of the Spruce Production Division of the Signal Corps of the Army, hereinafter referred to as the officer in charge, shall survey and construct or cause to be surveyed and constructed for the Government, within six months after receipt of such request, a standard gauge railroad from a point on the line of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co.'s railroad in the State of Washington, to be determined by agreement between the parties, to the contractor's mill site to be constructed at or near Lake Pleasant in said State.

The parties to this contract are mentioned in the first paragraph thereof, to wit:

This agreement entered into this 18th day of May, 1918, by and between the Siems-Carey-H. S. Kerbaugh Corporation, * * * party of the first part, * * * and the United States of America, * * * represented by J. Van D. Crisp, captain, Signal Corps, United States Army, * * * acting by authority and under the direction of the Secretary of War, party of the second part.

The evidence discloses that powerful influences were at work upon Col. Disque—first to have him get a contract executed which did not contain a designation of the route; second, after the execution thereof to get him, through an assumption of authority, to reverse the decision of the Secretary of War and locate the railroad where these powerful financial interests wanted it located. Under the contract only the parties thereto could determine the route, and no evidence was presented to the committee to show that Col. Disque had such authority.

The leading spirit in the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation was Mr. Carey. He was also the leading spirit in the Siems-Carey Railway & Canal Co., that prior to 1918 had large contracts with the Chinese Government for the construction of railroads in China, involving an expenditure of approximately $150,000,000. This company was financed by the American International Corporation of New York City, of which Mr. John D. Ryan was a director. The American International Corporation was given 51 per cent of the stock of the Siems-Carey Railway & Canal Co., but the profits were divided equally between the two corporations. Thus it appears that Mr. Carey and Mr. Ryan were business associates. Mr. Ryan testified in the highest terms as to the business ability of Mr. Carey. Mr. Ryan was the direct superior of Col. Disque, who finally located the railroad where Mr. Carey and Mr. Kerbaugh from early April, 1918, had insisted that it should and would be located.

The railroad as constructed extended from Joyce Junction through Lyre Canyon, where the contractor cleared a route over 20 feet in width through solid granite rock about 150 feet in depth for a distance of about three-fourths of a mile, then along the side of the Olympic Mountain range where the contractor cut through dense forests and, excavating the earth from the side of the mountain, created a table land upon which the railroad was built, and then on through Muller Pass to Lake Pleasant. The work included the construction of tunnels, trestles, and bridges. The road cost in round figures $4,000,000 or approximately $110,000 per mile. The road is of the most substantial construction and permanent in character. The Spruce Production Corporation in February, 1919, gave it a salvage value of less than 8 per cent of its cost.

In connection with the spruce contract the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation began the construction of sawmills at Lake Pleasant and at Port Angeles, on the Strait of Juan de Fuca, involving an estimated expenditure of nearly two and one-half millions of dollars. The sawmill under construction at Port Angeles was of the most permanent character. There on 1 acre of ground some 2,700 piles were driven. In all the governmental operations carried on by this corporation under the foregoing contracts, at governmental expense and without financial risk, the work was of a remarkably permanent character. The Government was paying the cost, and it was the intention of the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation to continue in the lumber business in the Northwest after the war.

Mr. Kerbaugh testified that one of the factors that induced them to accept the spruce contract was that they could continue in lumber operations after the war was over, and that they expected to use the two mills being built at Port Angeles and at Lake Pleasant, together with the railroad, after the war.

On December 3, 1918, Mr. Ryan sent a communication to the Secretary of War in reference to charges made by a representative of the Military Intelligence Bureau in relation to the construction of mills by the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation at Lake Pleasant and at Port Angeles, in which he stated under allegation No. 8:

> These two mills were built on cost-plus contracts, as stated. As to their location so that "these men will be afile to control the lumber industry and that Carey contends that they are in the game to stay," I have to say that any one or two mills would have great difficulty in controlling the lumber industry of the Pacific Northwest, and I do not see where they would have the advantage over anyone else in the district. Carey stated at the beginning of the negotiations, in which I had part, that they did not expect to ever secure any profit from the contract, except to the extent that they were able to amortize and reduce the cost of the plant to the Government and take it over on an appraisal that would enable them to engage in the lumber business. That was, I believe, the chief incentive in their making the contract, and never disguised as far as I know.

When Mr. Kerbaugh was asked how he regarded the Lake Crescent Railroad, he testified:

> As a trunk-line railroad, entering into a magnificent district for timber that would last for many, many years, and that you were justified in spending any amount of money necessary to get the minimum grades.

He further testified in reference to the Olympic timber tract:

> It is the last big body of timber I know of in the United States.

Mr. Franklin Helm, a prospective associate of Mr. Carey in this enterprise, but finally frozen out, in reference to this immense timber tract, testified:

> Well, we have had experts up there, and we have had the British Government send some experts up there, and others, and they all came to the same conclusion as ourselves, and that was that about one-eighth of the standing timber in the United States is on that peninsula.

Mr. Calkins, vice president of the Milwaukee road, in reference to a conversation had with Mr. Byram, president of the road, about March, 1918, testified:

> Now, I think I said to Mr. Byram at that time, "If they want spruce, why don't they, in the railroad parlance, tie onto the end of our line and go to the spruce district?" * * * There was more or less spruce available on this line from Deep Creek extension, a greater portion of the way to what would be known as the Pysht Summit, and over the Lake Crescent line there was no spruce available at all until you reached the Lake Pleasant district; that is, practically none.

Mr. Erling, general manager of the lines of the Milwaukee Railroad west of the Missouri River, testified that he recommended the line extending from Deep Creek to Pleasant Lake all the time; that the proposed extension from Deep Creek was the shorter and required less railroad construction to reach a common point at Lake Pleasant than the Lake Crescent route; that it was an easier class of work, cheaper and in more timber; that the allegation that the Deep Creek route had some very hard grades was not correct; that the grades as projected on that line were 2 per cent westbound and 1½ per cent eastbound; and that the Deep Creek extension was the most feasible one and the proper one to make.

He further testified that the Milwaukee road could have been extended from Deep Creek into the Olympic timber tract at a moderate cost, ranging under normal conditions from $35,000 to perhaps $50,000 per mile, and that such road when completed would have been reasonably worth in time of peace approximately $40,000 a mile.

President Bryam testified that after Mr. Carey had called upon him on April 17, 1918, he made a memorandum which contained the following:

> 1. That the Milwaukee thought the development of that country ought to be made by the extension of our line from Deep Creek.
> 2. That the Government should furnish the money for building the road, the Milwaukee to take charge of it for the Government.
> 3. That the question of the ultimate ownership or the price to be paid the Government for the road should be determined either by negotiation or at some future time, but should not be allowed to interfere with the building of the line without delay.

It will be apparent that if the Deep Creek route had been extended the Milwaukee Railroad and not the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation would have controlled the timber on the Olympic tract.

The first spruce contract was made with the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation at Portland, Oreg., about April 12, 1918. This contract was discarded and a new contract entered into bearing date May 12, 1918, and approved by Mr. Ryan on May 28, 1918, which contained a significant option not found in the first contract. That option reads:

> In lieu of transferring to the Government the aforesaid property and property rights, real and personal, the seller may at its option retain the same, in which event there shall be deducted from the amount due from the Government to the seller under this article a sum equal to the value of all such property and property rights, real and personal, as fixed and determined by a board of three persons, one to be chosen by the Government, one by the seller, and the third by two so chosen.

The loggers and lumbermen of the Northwest, realizing that their vast business interests were threatened by this favored eastern corporation, demanded an investigation which was finally undertaken by the War Department. Maj. Ray conducted the investigation of his superiors and rendered a whitewash report. Maj. Gen. McIntyre, then executive assistant to the Chief of Staff, in a memorandum for the Director of Air Service, dated March 5, 1919, in commenting upon this report, says in part:

> The point in question is, What caused a reversal of the decision to build the Deep Creek route and by whose authority was the action of the Secretary of War of April 24, 1918, reversed?

He further says:

> There can be no question but that some of the logging interests in the Northwest deeply resented a "foreign" concern coming into their territory with the largest contract that the Government had let and then subletting part of the work to local operators. The Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh contract was a most profitable one for the corporation and guaranteed a minimum profit of 7 per cent to the contractor on all expenditures except the overhead cost of the New York office. This clause is unusually liberal, inasmuch as the corporation was being financed by the Government, and had the contract been carried to completion it would have meant a profit of about $1,400,000 on a project which involved no financial risk on the part of the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Co. and covered a period of 18 months.
> There is nothing in these papers to show that any of the principal members of this firm had previous experience in this line of work, but that contract was negotiated and obtained through the efforts of Mr. Pliny Fisk, of Harvey Fisk & Sons.

He further says:

In view of the positive recommendations of the Aircraft Board, the commanding officer of the Spruce Production Division, and the Chief Signal Officer that the Crescent Lake route be not built, further detailed explanation should be made covering the reason for the reversal of this opinion. It is not intended to cast any reflection upon Gen. Disque and the other officers concerned, but "to protect the reputations" of these men and "to protect the War Department." A possible congressional investigation with reference to the location of this railroad might prove embarrassing to the War Department, as the plain insinuation would be made that the decision was influenced by the large financial interests concerned. The War Department should therefore gather together all available data covering this question and file it for future use in case such an investigation is had.

So far as we know no explanation was ever made and no data covering the question ever gathered together and filed in the War Department.

Mr. Ryan took good care of Col. Disque. After Col. Disque had succeeded in getting a division of soldiers in the Northwest, Mr. Ryan recommended that he be given a general's star, and Col. Disque got the star. After the armistice was signed, through the influence of Mr. Ryan, Gen. Disque was made president of G. Amsinck & Co., an importing and exporting corporation having offices at No. 90 Wall Street, New York City, at the princely salary of $30,000 per year, which job Gen. Disque still holds down. All the stock of G. Amsinck & Co. is owned by the American International Corporation, of which Mr. Ryan is a director. Prior to such appointment Gen. Disque had no knowledge of the importing and exporting business, and why Mr. Ryan selected him for this position has not been made clear to the committee.

Mr. Steinbrink, the able counsel for the committee, after calling the attention of Mr. Ryan, when upon the witness stand in New York City, to some of the material facts proved, said:

Now, those are the facts, Mr. Ryan, with which I was confronted, and, it seems to me, that with those facts standing out there was an explanation necessary. Whether or not you have made the explanation is not for me to say.

At the hearings of the committee in New York City Mr. Ryan, after being sworn, made a vicious attack upon the majority members of the committee. As the committee had been sent out by the House under a resolution unanimously adopted, this attack appeared to me to be an attack upon the House, and as neither the distinguished chairman of the committee nor the counsel for the committee called Mr. Ryan to account, I assumed that responsibility and demanded that he prove his accusations. This he utterly failed to do. Afterwards he filed a long, wearisome, pusillanimous statement with the committee that does not explain, but does state that he had no intention of attacking the House. I am pleased that he has made an apology even to that extent. As for his personal attack upon me I care nothing, but I will tell you how I feel about the House. If anyone should attack the House in my presence I would defend the House, as I would my country, to the last breath, right or wrong. [Applause.]

I have only the kindliest feeling toward Mr. Ryan. In fact, he possesses several characteristics that excite my admiration. I admire his nerve, his audacity, his dash. I like his style. If his great financial genius and remarkable ability could be directed along the lines of rectitude, equity, and justice in matters affecting the public interest he would be a material asset to this country.

I say now, as I stated to Mr. Ryan in New York City, that if it was improper for him to sign the railroad contract by reason of his connections with the Milwaukee Railroad—and he has sworn that he refused to sign such contract by reason of such connections—then it was equally improper for him to sign the spruce contract, involving an estimated expenditure of nearly six times the cost of the construction of the Lake Crescent Railroad. Under both contracts, if carried to completion, the Milwaukee Railroad would be a beneficiary. The spruce contract would be worthless without a railroad to transport the timber and the railroad contract would be worthless without timber to transport.

The evidence shows that Mr. Ryan executed the railroad contract with the same force and effect as if he had signed it. In his trip to the Northwest in July, 1918, he made a particular inspection of the construction work under the Lake Crescent Railroad contract, but he neglected to inspect the construction work of the two wasteful railroad contracts being carried out in the forests of Oregon. If it was improper for Mr. Ryan to sign the railroad contract then, it seems to me, it was equally improper for him to execute it. [Applause.] He started for the Northwest about July 20, 1918, and returned East about August 10, 1918. With headquarters at Portland, the governmental railroad operations in the forests of Oregon were within easy reach, while it was a long trip to get to the Lake Crescent Railroad operations in the State of Washington. He testified that he hurried back East in response to a telegram from the Secretary of War, whom he had agreed to accompany to Europe. However, they did not start on their European trip until about two weeks after Mr. Ryan's return to the city of Washington. The committee has endeavored to get a detailed explanation from Mr. Ryan of all the material facts connected with governmental operations in the Northwest while he was Director of Aircraft, but he does not explain.

Abuse of the majority members of the committee and the assertion that their action is based upon bias, prejudice, and partisanship do not explain. We are acting under our oath of office and feel that it is our duty to present to you the facts disclosed by the evidence. If the House did not want the facts, then a mistake was made in placing us upon the committee. We must perform our duty without fear or favor from any person or from any quarter. We refuse to play favorites.

The material facts presented are undisputed in the evidence. It is possible that different conclusions may be drawn by different persons. I do not present any conclusions and do not desire to influence you in the premises. I do not present my personal views but merely call your attention to material facts proved at the hearings of the committee and you can draw your own conclusions. I appreciate that it takes some degree of courage to give to the country the facts, and that any Member of the House in doing so makes himself a target for abuse from those influenced by self-interest or partisanship, but I feel that I would be an arrant coward and unfit to sit in the House if I shirked a public duty by reason of lack of courage. [Applause.]

The amount of airplane lumber produced in the Northwest was approximately 80,000,000 feet of spruce, 60,000,000 of fir, and 3,000,000 of cedar, in all 143,000,000 feet. The total amount expended in getting this lumber from the best forests in this country was $48,762,826. The four cost-plus contractors received from the Government $19,015,368, of which amount the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation was paid $8,329,652. Of the 143,000,000 feet of lumber, 7.4 per cent came from logs furnished by these four cost-plus contractors and the rest, 92.6 per cent, from logs furnished by the independent loggers of the Northwest, disorganized as they were. There were more than 400 sawmills functioning in the States of Washington and Oregon, owned and operated by as patriotic men as can be found in this country. If they had been organized and their energies concentrated under the direction of an experienced lumberman they would have produced at moderate cost within a reasonable time all the aircraft lumber required by our allies and ourselves.

Those placed in authority in the Northwest by the War Department not only had no experience in the lumber business, but they were arrogant, autocratic, and operated wholly regardless of law and authority. Those that had no power to do so ordered the construction of railroads in Oregon through cost-plus contractors at large governmental expense and not in the public interest.

On the plea that labor was scarce Col. Disque accumulated there 28,000 soldiers and 1,200 officers. These men were lawyers, doctors, dentists, clerks, and almost wholly citizens who knew nothing about logging and lumbering. They did the best they could while longing all the while to be with their comrades in France. These soldiers were paid prevailing civilian wages by the War Department, ranging from $3.50 to as high as $8 per day each, in defiant violation of law.

The excess in the civilian pay above the compensation fixed by the Congress is estimated at more than $4,000,000. The sole power to fix the compensation of men in the service is in the Congress of the United States. Mr. Ryan testified that he heartily approved of these payments, regardless of the fact that our soldiers were fighting and dying in France at the compensation of $1 per day, as fixed by law. Mr. Kerbaugh testified that his corporation did not need soldier labor at all but was able to get all of the labor needed. The reason he gave for using soldier labor was:

Because the Government insisted on giving it to us.

Those who were responsible for this unlawful expenditure of public funds should be held strictly accountable therefor. [Applause.] The Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Corporation was actually paid by the War Department a 7 per cent commission on civilian wages paid to soldiers working for subcontractors in the construction of the Lake Crescent Railroad in excess of the compensation fixed by the Congress of the United States.

Some people say, "Well, the water has gone over the wheel; let the dead past bury its dead." I would be willing to do that if there did not exist in this country an organized, unpatriotic propaganda to discredit the work of this committee and to make the American people believe that those who were responsible for the Aircraft Service in the United States during the war were a great success; that they deserve public commendation; and that the United States has made material progress in aviation.

We take the ground that aviation is of tremendous importance to the security of this country and that the people should be made to understand that the United States to-day, as compared with the strength of any other great world power in aviation, is like a new born babe. We feel that if the people realize this fact they will demand and insist that Congress perform its full duty to the country and to posterity in the matter of aviation.

In all the long, tedious months of arduous work and investigation, while I had to live in the past I have been thinking of the future. We can judge the future only by the past, and we must judge the past in preparation for the future. Hostile bombing planes carrying tons of high explosives must not be permitted to fly unchallenged over our country. [Applause.] The Navy can protect us on the sea, the Army on the land, but who except American birdmen can protect our property and our women and children from bombs dropped high in the air? We must not forget that in case of attack supremacy in the air must be quickly determined. There is no place to dig in and no place for our air-men to hide except above or behind the clouds. They must either stand and fight or turn tail and fly away. They can not fight to win unless they have efficient machines, guns, bombs, and protective apparatus and equipment.

We must make sufficient appropriations for the development and growth of aviation in the Army, in the Navy, and in the Post Office and Interior Departments. In addition, we must make provision for the development and growth of civil and commercial aviation. We must get the public interested and make of the public a great reserve reservoir in time of need. We have the wealth, the resources, and the men of genius who, if given the opportunity, can and will put America where she belongs—in the front rank of the nations in aviation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] is recognized for two hours. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. What length of time was occupied by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE]?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] occupied 50 minutes.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, a candid reading of the two reports on aviation filed in the House will disclose beyond question that one or the other, or both, are largely dictated by bias and overzeal. Bias is a quality of which its possessor is unaware. I am subject to the same influence of bias as the gentlemen on the other side. I have no power to present the facts in this matter except as they appear to me. If through bias or prejudice or overzeal I misstate the facts or draw conclusions unwarranted, I hope the judgment of my colleagues in this House will to that extent discount my statements.

THE MAJORITY REPORT.

As I view the work of the majority of this committee, this investigation has been conducted with a bias and overzeal that has precluded a proper and proportionate consideration of the facts and has resulted in a report that fails to accurately present the matters with which it deals.

In the very early part of this report statements are made which illustrate its methods of presenting the facts. In a word, these statements to which I will call your attention may be taken as the text upon which the majority report is founded. The report states:

The expenditure of over $1,000,000,000 produced the following machines used by American aviators on the French front:

American-built bombing planes	None.
American-built observation planes	213
Machines bought from our allies	527
Total planes on French front Nov. 11, 1918	740

It is true that over $1,000,000,000 was spent. It is true that at the hour of the armistice there were 213 American-built planes on the front. It is true that the Americans had 740 planes on the front that day. But this totally fails to give the facts. Further the report says:

That in brief is the story of American aircraft-production failure.

In substance this statement asserts these things: First, that over $1,000,000,000 produced 740 airplanes. But the 740 airplanes which the Americans had on the front on the day of the armistice represented less than one dollar out of sixty spent by America for aviation purposes.

PLANES ON THE FRONT.

This statement charges that no "American-built bombing planes" were on the front. As a matter of fact, on the day of the armistice 93 of the 117 bombing planes under American command on the front were American-built bombing planes. There is no dispute in the evidence about that fact. Innumerable witnesses have declared it. Judge Hughes in his report found that the American-built machines were being "successfully used as observation and bombing planes." There is no foundation in fact in the world for this declaration of the report. Yet in the very opening page of this report it is declared that America had no bombing planes upon the front. Then the report, in substance, states and repeatedly reiterates that only 213 American-built machines were used on the front. As a matter of fact, according to the testimony of Gen. Pershing, 417 American-built machines were used on the front and took part in the war in an active way over the battle lines. On the day of the armistice 528 American-built machines were immediately available for the front and within telephone call of the front lines. The 213 machines referred to as the only American-built planes used on the fighting front represent less than one fifty-fifth part of the planes built by America during this war. It is a perversion of fact to say American aircraft production failure is established by presenting one fifty-fifth part of its planes as the total production. During the war America built 11,760 planes.

America sent to Europe 1,213 American-built service planes. With the addition of those purchased from the Allies the Americans had over 3,300 service planes in Europe during the war.

The statement that 527 is the number of planes bought of the Allies, or bought of them and used on the front, is equally unsupported by facts. The evidence without contradiction is that the Allies furnished to America 5,071 planes, and of those planes 2,375 were service planes. On the day of the armistice the American forces had 1,620 service planes immediately available for use on the western front.

EXPENDITURES.

The sum of over $1,000,000,000 expended and allotted for aircraft purposes, not including some funds for the Signal Corps, from the beginning of the war up to the 30th of June, 1919, includes the following items:

Airplanes and spare parts, instruments and accessories	$209, 265, 464. 18
Engines and spare parts, instruments and accessories	293, 651, 525. 70
Balloons and spare parts, instruments and accessories	14, 452, 941. 38
Transportation equipment	49, 292, 474. 18
General equipment, including ordnance and special clothing	69, 940, 985. 97
Maintenance and operation of squadrons	30, 237, 462. 20
Purchase and lease of land, construction, maintenance, etc	106, 803, 633. 93
Pay of Reserve Corps, travel expenses, etc	24, 658, 836. 13

From this it will be seen that the total amount for airplanes and engines, including spare parts, instruments, and accessories, cost this country $503,000,000.

During the war America acquired 16,831 airplanes, or more than twenty-two times the number of planes which the report says we produced by the expenditure of over a billion dollars. The total of these planes, including 37,335 engines, cost America only one-half of the billion dollars that the report says produced 740 planes. In other words, what the report declares was produced by $1,000,000,000 is in fact less than 3 per cent of what was procured by the expenditure of that sum.

Thus this "story of aircraft production" is as follows: Over $1,000,000,000 produced, according to report, planes, 740. In fact, planes, 16,831; engines, 37,335; other property costing $500,000,000.

AIRCRAFT ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

It would be utterly absurd for me to stand here and tell you that everything in the aircraft effort of this country was efficiently and economically conducted. Never since this world began could a mushroom organization be created overnight, as we had to create it in this war, and get the highest degree of efficiency and results. So it is true we did not get that in our aircraft program. But we did accomplish important results. I want briefly to call your attention to some of them.

In the first place, when we entered upon the war program it was absolutely necessary to train our men, to have flying fields for that purpose, and to provide for the manufacture of training and other planes and transport them to Europe. We established 41 flying fields here and in Europe that cost over $100,000,000. We had 28 mechanical schools to teach the boys of this country to make and maintain airplanes and engines. Twenty-two thousand boys of America received instruction in our ground schools. Our personnel increased from 1,300 to 170,000 men, of whom 78,000 were sent overseas.

America acquired 16,831 airplanes during the war. Of these, 6,287 went to the forces in Europe. She manufactured 11,760. She purchased 5,071 from the Allies. She sent overseas 1,213 of American manufacture. She had over 3,300 service planes used by our forces in Europe.

In addition to that America acquired 37,335 engines. She made 30,630.

Three years of the European war failed to solve the engine problem so far as a powerful engine for heavy planes that could be put in quantity production was concerned. While the Allies developed some good engines they never secured a powerful engine for large production. America, in a joint agreement with the Allies, assumed responsibility for developing such an engine. The result was the Liberty engine, which was one of the greatest accomplishments we attained during the war.

For months during the war this country was surfeited with criticisms and denunciations of the Liberty engine effort.

In a shortness of time that has perhaps never been surpassed it was successfully placed in quantity production. When it took a 28,000-pound seaplane across the Atlantic without missing a shot, it silenced the denunciation of its last sincere detractor.

Practically every Navy plane used in the war was equipped with the Liberty engine, of which 3,482 were supplied the Navy before the armistice. Admiral Taylor, of the Navy, testified it solved their engine problem.

The Allies helped bear the expense of the Liberty engine, and their approval of it is demonstrated by the fact that at the close of the war they had ordered 16,000 Liberty engines to be delivered by the United States.

At the time of the armistice the Liberty engine was being produced at the rate of 46,000 per year.

The airplane engines made by America during this war of 19 months in horsepower nearly equaled one-eighth of the horsepower of all the locomotives in the United States. They had a power sufficient to draw a train of cars 5,000 miles long. In addition to that our effort is not measured by the number of planes we had on the front.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to ask him if all this was accomplished for this expenditure of $1,050,000,000.

Mr. LEA of California. It was. We placed 15,000 men in the English factories to do aircraft work on the other side. We placed 4,000 men to relieve Frenchmen from other duties so they could go into their airplane factories. We furnished France materials for 9,000 engines and 1,800 airplanes. We sent 90,000,000 feet of spruce to the Allies and 1,385 engines. We sent them about 20,000 tons of spare parts and mechanical tools for the manufacture of aircraft, and great quantities of cotton fabric. We sent them 30,000 tons of wood chemicals. Finally, it was by American effort and American materials that allied air forces were maintained on the front. [Applause.]

AT THE FRONT.

What did the boys of America do at the front? In battle they flew over 35,000 hours and traveled over 3,500,000 miles. The boys of America, in machines owned by America, conducted 150 separate bombing raids. They threw 275,000 pounds of explosives on the German operations. Seventy-five per cent of the bombing planes used by Americans at the close of the war were those manufactured in America. They destroyed ammunition dumps, railroad stations, and centers of supplies behind the German lines. The observation planes of America were the eyes of our Army, without which no modern warfare can be successfully conducted.

The report speaks in derogation of the observation planes. The most important work performed in war by airplanes up to this day has been by the observation plane. The pursuit plane is valuable and the bombing plane is valuable, but the one absolutely essential machine is the observation plane. That was the greatest use to which the American-made machine was applied.

Here is this final result: For every airplane that went down in combat carrying an American boy 2.69 enemy planes fell. [Applause.] You can try to belittle everything done by your country, berate the French or the machines in which American boys fought, but such attacks will dash themselves to shame against the fact that while America lost 290 planes carrying down her precious boys, 776 of the Germans went down before their skill and courage. [Applause.]

When the history of this war is written it will be freely conceded that it was the effort of America in this mutual effort to overcome the enemy that made possible at the close of the war the aircraft predominance of the allied forces by over 100 per cent. [Applause.] It was not a question of how many planes we had there; it was a question of how many planes the Allies had there. The war was a joint and mutual operation to which we all contributed, and in the end America achieved that for which she poured out her billions—victory. [Applause.] She achieved that victory so certainly and so surprisingly prompt that all the world knows and will never forget.

DH–4.

The DH–4 was the only Army service plane made in America and used at the front. America made 3,431. Nearly all of the balance of the 11,760 planes made by America other than experimental were of the training type. The DH–4 has been the subject of much criticism. The DH–4 was an English machine manufactured by America on the joint recommendation of the Allies. American experts and those of Europe in conference agreed that it was one of the planes that America should make. It did not reach quantity production until May, 1918. Some machines were immediately sent to the other side. There it was discovered that it was not really fit for practical use. What was done? They put it into the shops and corrected the principal defects and cabled the American factories to make like corrections before future shipments. That was done. But it caused a let-up in the shipment of planes for August.

The most urgently essential of these defects to be remedied were not fundamental but important, though comparatively trivial in mechanical character, being mostly due to structural defects. After these machines were overhauled in France, a board of fliers was appointed by Gen. Patrick to test and investigate the machine before it was permitted to be used over the German lines. This board of fliers reported favorably upon the machine. The designer of the English machine, from which the American was copied, after inspecting it declared that in many respects it was superior to the English machine which had been successfully used on the front. The American machine as it thus went into the service, on account of the superior horsepower over the English machine, could fly away from it at will.

As it was the evolution of a new machine by America, the defects were not surprising. Wide circulation of reports of these early defects of the American-made machine tended to discredit it. Reports of these early defects have been used to discredit this machine up to this time. In fact, the majority report before us quotes from the Thomas hearings relating to the De Havilands before its defects were thus corrected in criticism of the machine as finally used. As shown by the Thomas report, the Senate committee had no evidence before it as to the operation of the De Havilands as corrected at the time the report was filed.

The first squadron of American-built machines went over the German lines on the 7th of August, 1918. A great many opinions have been expressed in regard to that machine, but I believe that a careful consideration of the evidence will justify the statement that substantially the DH–4 was as good a machine as there was of its type at the front.

The plane in itself was not as good as some of the foreign-built planes on the front before the end of the war. But the Liberty engine in it was so much superior in power to the foreign engines that the two, the plane and the engine together, were on the whole as good as any machine of that type that was at the front up to the fall of 1918.

I shall not take up in detail the adverse comment that has been made of the DH–4. Capt. Kindley, a witness before this committee, was an expert flier in the Aviation Service. He had some experience with the DH–4 and also a number of pursuit planes. He has a record of 12 victories in fights with the enemy. He recognized practical defects in the DH–4. But he regarded it as "a wonderful production."

Each squadron of the war has written its own history. The fliers of the Fiftieth Aero Squadron, who used this American-built machine at the front, in the history of their squadron refer to the defects of the De Havilands, particularly to their objection to the location of the gas tank and the separation of the observer and pilot. Nevertheless, they summarize their opinion of the DH–4 as follows:

> Altogether the Liberty plane was considered the best on the front, and its excellent speed and climbing power were well demonstrated in actual combat with enemy planes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would like to get into the RECORD the fact that Mr. Kindley was born and reared in my district, and was only 24 years of age, and died a short time ago, serving his country. [Applause.]

Mr. LEA of California. I was not aware of that fact. His death is to be regretted. Capt. Kindley left a record of which his kinsmen and friends may be proud. Not only did he have 12 victories to his credit, but his squadron had 66 victories to its credit to 7 losses.

The quotation attributed to the testimony of Richenbacker in criticising the DH–4 illustrates the unusual methods of investigation pursued by this committee. Prior to the time Richenbacker was a witness before this committee, excerpts were read into the record from a more or less sensational book, of which he was the author. Richenbacker was subsequently called as a witness and testified at length. In his testimony he admitted his inexperience with the DH–4. His sworn testimony given by questions and answers made no such references to the DH–4 as were contained in the quotations from his book. In quoting Richenbacker the majority report is confined entirely to quotations from the sensational book and entirely omits references to the testimony given by questions and answers, which modified the inferences of the book quotations.

It is at once apparent that if facts in important investigations can be established by reading into the record selections from sensational books, any vagary ever conceived by the human mind can be asserted in congressional "evidence" as solemn facts.

Lieut. Maynard was a test pilot at the greatest plane assembling place in France. During the war he was tester for 17 different makes of machines. He delivered planes from the assembling point to nearly every front-line station. He has flown the DH–4 perhaps more than any other man. He testified that the principal criticism of the DH–4 came from those who had little familiarity with its practical operation, and that he regarded it as good as other machines of similar type at the front during the war.

CASUALTIES.

This report emphasizes what is called the "utterly unsafe" DH–4. The report says:

Sending American aviators into action with these DH–4's was more wasteful of human life, even in the hands of the best trained aviators, than it would have been to equip shock troops with wooden guns.

What are the facts? As I told you before, for every American machine that went down 2.69 of the enemy machines fell.

It would be wonderful shock troops that with wooden guns could secure equal accomplishments against the skill, preparation, and bravery of the German soldiers. [Applause.] That would be the greatest wooden-gun operation that ever occurred in the history of the world.

The fatalities with the DH–4, as compared with pursuit planes made in Europe, were a minimum. It is only fair to say there is no fair basis of comparison between observation and bombing plane fatalities as compared with pursuit planes. The pursuit-plane risk is greater. Four hundred and seventeen of these American-built planes were used over the battle lines. The total loss was 33 out of the 417. Two hundred and thirty-six men were killed in the Aviation Service in battle. Of those 38 were in DH–4's. Of the 236 men killed in battle, only 16 went down with the American-built machines in flames. So 7 per cent of the total death loss on the front were those who perished by going down in flames in American-made machines. That was the common danger of every flier on the front. The use of the incendiary bullet was a common method of attack in battle. Of the total casualties from all causes, a little less than 15 per cent, or 76 out of 516, were in American planes. Gen. Mitchell, in describing the losses over the lines, says that the American losses in bombardment, for which purpose the DH–4 was largely used, "were very small."

In this criticism of the DH–4 a reference is made to the transcontinental race. In the transcontinental race seven men in the race proper were killed as a result of five accidents. There were two accidents by prospective entrants before the race began. Of those nine men who perished, not in a single instance was the plane forced to leave the air on account of any defect in the plane. There were three instances in which men were killed under circumstances which may justify a contention that the construction of the plane was a factor in the accident. Those three instances were where the man in the front seat between the engine and the gas tank was killed, while the man behind was not killed. In one case the aeroplane went directly into a tree at a rate of 100 miles on hour. The man in the front seat was killed, while the man in the rear was not. It would require rather a stretch of the imagination to say without doubt that the plane was to blame for the death of the man in the front seat. In another case two men going west on the transcontinental race, traveling in a snowstorm, were suddenly confronted by a mountain looming up before them. They collided. The man in the front seat perished, while the one in the rear survived. In the third case a machine was in New York on its way to enter the race. The pilot lost his bearings in the haze. He left the air to learn his location. He landed on rough ground. The ship crashed, and the man in the front seat was killed, while the one in the rear was not.

Out of those nine deaths these are the only three that can be said in any degree to be due to the construction of this machine. Of the three lives lost, probably the last, but neither of the other two, would have been saved had the front seat been located behind the gas tank.

SERVICE OF DH–4.

The DH–4 is declared time and again to be useless, or nearly so, in this report. Listen to this testimony of Gen. Mitchell before this committee describing the bombardment work on the front, and then answer the question whether or not its work was useless:

In addition to that, we organized our bombardment and the pursuit aviation not used in this barrage work to act independently, to hit their important centers upon their lines and force them to protect them. Now, in that way you would cause a great deal of havoc and trouble on the ground, and in the meantime you could call back the ships used at the other places to finish those places if they were important enough. * * * The way we did that was to send our bombardment to a certain point over here and have the pursuit meet them at that place. * * * So the enemy would find them always on their trail. That worked admirably. * * * The losses from bombardment were very small. * * * We had them going in the air.

Three-fourths of the machines used for that bombardment at the close of the war were American squadrons. In the Battle of the Argonne 11 squadrons were American-built machines, numbering about 220. In that battle, one of the greatest battles that ever occurred in the history of the world, the American-built machine was the eyes of the American Army, and in addition to that took part in the bombardment operations such as Gen. Mitchell has described.

"213" PLANES.

In this report and throughout the investigation of this committee we have heard a great deal about America having only 213 planes, as if that was all we had in Europe. This contention is asserted and reasserted, notwithstanding the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that 1,213 DH–4's were received in Europe before the armistice.

This report says:

Col. Patrick stated that the only machines in use at the front by Americans were 527 foreign bought or borrowed planes, supplemented by 213 observation De Haviland 4's.

Neither Patrick nor anybody else ever said that outside of members of this committee. That contention is utterly absurd. It is just as reasonable, just as logical, to contend that because on a certain day America had only 500,000 men at the front that those were all the soldiers that she had in Europe, although there were 1,500,000 men immediately behind the lines. With over 3,300 service planes owned by America in France, this report in substance tries to convince somebody that the only planes we had there were 740, and that of those only 213 were American built. At another place the report says:

The failure of Gen. Pershing to receive more than 213 of these De Haviland 4's with which to face the enemy—

And so forth. Then later on the report says:

Good judgment was displayed when over 1,000 De Haviland 4's were scrapped and burned in France after the armistice.

Six hundred and twelve American planes were returned to this country after the war. According to the report Gen. Pershing burned up 1,000. And yet, according to this report, he received only 213. That is a greater miracle than the miracle of the loaves and fishes. [Applause.] The report further says:

Apart from the 213 used at the front, the remainder of the De Haviland 4's were put to better use by being kept boxed and stored in this country as coffin-shaped monuments to official stupidity and criminal stubbornness.

Only 213, and all the rest boxed and stored in this country! There were 1,213 delivered in France and every one of them was uncrated except 4 that had arrived just before the armistice. If anywhere there were any De Haviland 4's crated and boxed it was only because they were waiting transportation under crowded transportation conditions to go where they could be useful.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. LEA of California. I will, briefly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I would like to ask if the minority report which the gentleman has made is in harmony with the report of Justice Hughes in reference to the same investigation?

Mr. LEA of California. The answer to that, to be accurate, would require a greater comparison of details than I have attempted to make. But I will say this: There have been a number of reports on aviation. The report of the majority is the first report that has ever been made after an investigation of aircraft matters in which the report has found nothing good in the production effort. Justice Hughes, in his report, declared that the De Haviland 4 was being "successfully used as an observation and bombing plane" at the front. The majority report in this case declares we had no American-made bombing planes at the front, and that the De Haviland 4 was useless. In a number of instances the report of Justice Hughes and the report of the Senate committee found things to commend. For instance, the Senate committee commended the work of John D. Ryan, while this report finds nothing commendable in it.

DANGER FROM FIRE.

Now, going back to the question about the De Haviland 4's being "flaming coffins," I have heard that so often that finally I endeavored to find out the facts from the records of the Aircraft Division. This is the way the matter came up before the committee: One day in the early stages of the hearings the chairman read into the record an excerpt from a rather sensational book in which it was stated that the De Haviland 4's on the other side were known as "flaming coffins." After that the excerpt from the sensational book became "evidence." When we once got that "flaming coffin" into the record I heard many "flaming-coffin" speeches.

I heard "flaming-coffin" speeches in Chicago and repeated again at Seattle and Portland. In fact, you could go back and look up the newspaper files and trace the trail of this committee across the continent by "flaming-coffin" speeches left behind. So in order to get the facts, I learned how many planes went down in flames. I found that out of 290 American planes that fell in combat 33 went down in flames. Of those 33, only 8 were DH–4's—just a little over 25 per cent of the total losses in flames. Seven American Spads went down in flames, six of the Salmson, and five Breguet.

Complaint is made that this loss in flames was due to the fact that America failed to cover her gasoline tanks with what is called protective covers. Those covers were a sort of mushy rubberoid substance intended to protect the tank from the incendiary bullets and for preventing a leak of gasoline on hot portions of the engine and thus igniting.

The Salmson and Breguet operated by the American forces had covers. Eleven Salmon-Breguets went down in flames, while only eight DH–4's went down in flames. There were five squadrons of those machines, and there were four squadrons of the DH–4's from which these numbers went down in flames.

In other words, the Salmson and Breguet machines had a flame loss, notwithstanding their covers, of 33 per cent of the total loss in flames. Most of the machines on the front were without covers. Only late in the ar were they used. The cover was practically unused by the British and Germans. It was used on only part of the French machines and not on the American-built machines. The Americans had 12 of these 27 squadrons at the front equipped with covers. The cover helped only to a degree. The fire risk was a common danger in war. We regret that even one perished. A man who goes to maintain his flag on the battle lines, unfortunately, must be willing to accept the danger of war. The man who is not willing to accept the risk of war can never honorably carry the American flag to where it will achieve victory. [Applause.]

But here is the absurdity of the contention: Out of this aircraft investigation we find the principal topics for discussion are 213 planes out of 16,000 and 8 planes causing the death of 16 men of the 7,000,000 men who perished in the war.

After a war because of which more than 100,000 of the boys of America to-day sleep in their graves in France, where they heroically perished for their country, it is utterly absurd, so nonsensical as to be almost unbelievable, that men who, after investigating the expenditure of a billion dollars, can find nothing more sensible to talk about than that 8 planes went down in flames, in which 16 boys of 7,000,000 perished. [Applause.]

The other day a speech was made in Congress in which a letter was presented in the RECORD purporting to be from a man, I believe in Tennessee, who withheld his name, saying that he belonged to the Twentieth American Aero Squadron, and among other things he made this statement:

I personally saw five go down in one fight in flames. * * * The criminals that sent that machine with an unprotected gasoline tank to be used on the front—

And so forth.

Now, what is the fact? On that day that squadron entered a terrific fight. The American squadron was in charge of a man by the name of Cooper. Cooper's report is on file in the War Department. The early report from that battle was that of the planes that went down one was in flames, and that was the plane in control of Cooper. Cooper was captured by the Germans and finally returned to the American line. His report is on file in the War Department. That report shows that not a single one of those planes went down in flames. Cooper's plane went down and he was captured by the Germans. He tried to burn it in order to prevent their capturing it, but failed to do so. We have in the RECORD the statement of the man who refused to let his name be used, and yet is willing to charge men with being criminals. One thing is plain to me, that a man who willfully assaults the good name and the reputations of others, without permitting the use of his own name, does a deed unworthy of a soldier of the Republic. [Applause.] A man that wants to ruin another's reputation and is not willing to put his own prestige at stake is like a man who stands in the dark and hurls a brick at a man in the light. So if this man wants to make his evidence a part of the record, he ought to come forward like other men, take an oath, give his testimony, and take responsibility like other witnesses.

ALLEGED OBSOLETE PLANES.

A great deal is said about obsolete planes. It is charged that France refused to give to America the same grade of machines she furnished to her own soldiers, and for that reason the Americans were compelled to fight in inferior French machines. The report says in reference to this that the machines furnished by the Allies to America included over "2,000 obsolete Nieuports and Sopwiths." Now, what is the fact? The only plane used in Europe that could be called obsolete was the service plane. When the service planes became obsolete they were transferred to training forces, when they were taken off the lines. America received from France 1,430 Nieuports for training purposes. She received 504 Sopwiths for training purposes. The total number of Sopwiths and Nieuports that America received from the Allies for service purposes was only 334. So this talk of 2,000 obsolete Sopwiths and Nieuports, when the total number of service planes received was only 334, is absolutely at variance with the facts and unsupported by any testimony.

On account of the rapid development of new types of planes there were always many obsolete planes on the fronts of all belligerents. The pilots of America and the pilots of all the belligerents used obsolete planes, or what were classified as such. In February, 1918, 63 per cent of the planes in use by the French were declared obsolete or obsolescent planes. The Thomas committee took testimony upon this subject. When the Thomas report was written it made this declaration:

Many of the machines our men are now forced to use in France are unsatisfactory, but not more so than those used by the French themselves.

In the face of the finding of the Thomas committee that the Americans were furnished the same class of machines at the same time the Frenchmen were furnished with them, we have the declaration of this committee that we had to use inferior machines. Gen. Patrick, when a witness before this committee—and Gen. Patrick, by his valor in Europe, is entitled to the respect of the American people—declared that the machines that were used by all the American Air Service were practically the same as were used by their allies, and were the equal of those used by their allies.

The Nieuport 28 is the particular service plane against which this complaint was made. Nineteen Nieuports piloted by Americans were destroyed in the war, 12 men killed, and 7 taken prisoners. The Nieuport was commonly used until it became antiquated and retired from the front about the 15th of July, 1918. After that it was used for training purposes.

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN PLANES.

This report states:

Bleeding France and exhausted England, with their backs against a wall, * * * were called on to furnish planes to the opulent and prosperous United States.

"Bleeding France, with her back against the wall!" Was she the victim of America? No. America went to "bleeding France" and gave her a transfusion of blood; revived her; and saved her. [Applause.] When America went to Europe, France urged the Americans to buy her planes. She urged America to buy two or three times as many planes as the Americans finally contracted to buy. Why? She argued that was the correct way to manage the war. About the 1st of December, 1917, an allied council was held in Paris. It was agreed at that council America should not attempt to build a single pursuit plane, but that we should build other kinds of planes. The talk of our imposing on bleeding France is utter nonsense. When we entered the war the effort to win became a mutual one between the Allies and ourselves. It was a mutual effort to overcome the effort of the enemy. We took some assistance from France and she took much more from us. To complain of taking a plane from France with which to defend her, when we paid her for that plane and manned it for her defense, is on a par with complaining because you used the pocketknife of a man you find—fallen, bleeding, wounded, and bound—in the street to release him from his predicament. [Applause.]

The report further says:

Apart from training planes, practically nothing but a handful of De Haviland 4s, "flaming coffins," was produced. The sorely pressed Allies were persuaded to sell us a "few" largely obsolescent planes.

"A handful" of De Haviland 4's was 3,431, and "a few" foreign planes were 5,071. That is the mathematical accuracy of the report of the majority.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is a manifestation of their "impartiality."

Mr. TILLMAN. Still "nonpartisan."

Mr. LEA of California. While we were out on the Pacific coast an attempt was made to discredit the effectiveness of the American aviators.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Did the testimony before your committee ever show that we ever had any fighting American-made planes in France?

Mr. LEA of California. Not what is technically known as fighting planes. We made no pursuit planes.

I am glad the gentleman mentioned that.

Mr. KEARNS. Gen. Pershing said we had none.

Mr. LEA of California. The fact that a machine is not a "fighting" plane does not mean that the machine does not have to fight. Every service plane that goes over the fighting lines is called upon to fight. The chief object of a so-called "fighting" machine, which is more correctly described as a pursuit plane, is to go in search of a fight, to destroy the enemy or drive him away. The mission of that plane is offensive fighting. The object of a bombing plane is primarily to deliver explosives on the operations of the enemy. If attacked it is prepared for defensive warfare. It is technically not a "fighting" machine, but nevertheless it may do effective fighting by bomb throwing and destroying men and property of the enemy. The mission of an observation plane is to inform the infantry and artillery of the position and activities of the enemy. To do that work is its primary mission. In order to accomplish its mission, however, it is frequently called upon to perform defensive fighting. Nevertheless, it is not a "fighting" machine. During the war bombing planes were used that cost as much as $50,000 apiece, yet technically they were not "fighting" planes. In that technical sense America made no fighting planes during the war. A Handley-Page or a Caproni might go 75 miles behind the German lines and kill 1,000 men, have a fight with a flock of pursuit planes on the way home, and still it was not called a "fighting" plane. In the same way the American-made DH-4 was called upon to fight and operated over the battle lines and used mounted guns, but technically it was not a "fighting" machine.

Mr. KEARNS. What do you call a combat plane?

Mr. LEA of California. It is also called a fighting plane, or a pursuit plane. The two terms are used for the same machine.

Mr. KEARNS. Gen. Pershing said we had no fighting planes.

Mr. LEA of California. That is, combat planes. That is correct in the technical sense. America did not build a single pursuit plane that was used on the western front, and it was agreed in France in 1917 that she should not.

Mr. KEARNS. Gen. Pershing said he never had enough fighting planes of any character to train the men over there, whether of foreign or American make.

Mr. LEA of California. It is true that we never had as many planes of any kind as we would liked to have had. That is why we were justified in spending this big sum of money, to try to get them there.

A witness was called to the stand out in Seattle or Portland who testified that he was in the battle of the Argonne. He said, "I never saw an American plane go after the Germans." This witness declared he saw planes every day, but did not know to what nation they belonged. Another flier at Everett, Wash., by the name of Summers, replied to that, not before our committee, however, but in the Everett Tribune, and in his reply he made this statement:

I want to refute that statement. * * * I was on the front from July 2 to November 11 along with the other members of our squadron, and we never lacked planes. We had from 26 to 32 all the time ready for duty. And I know it was the same with the Ninety-fourth, of which Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker was commander, and alongside whom we were working in the Argonne; and there were the Ninety-ninth, One hundred and twenty-second, Twenty-fourth, and Fiftieth squadrons that I know were as well equipped as we were. * * * Every day during that battle our squadrons sent out five planes every hour.

Prior to that time Gen. Mitchell had testified before this committee:

I was in charge of the entire forces at the Argonne, * * * and had 1,100 or 1,200 ships at Argonne.

AIR FATALITIES.

Another insistent criticism is as to the fatalities. The report calls attention to the fact, which I take to be a fact, that three times as many Americans in the Air Service perished as those of our allies according to the hours flown. Now, a simple statement of that fact might cause us to conclude that either the Americans were inferior aviators, or else they had inferior machines, or both. Now, what is the fact? The basis of comparison of effectiveness is not with somebody who did not fight, or who was not in the same contest. The basis is not a comparison with a bystander. The correct basis of comparison is with the enemy. When we compare the result of the contest of the American machines with the enemy's, we find that over two and one-half enemy machines went down for every American machine that fell in combat. [Applause.]

So what is the explanation? You have neither shown that the Americans had inferior foreign-made machines or inferior American-made machines. Neither have you shown that the Americans were cowards or inefficient. The facts on the basis of comparison show that they achieved a brilliant and overwhelming success. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does it not show that they simply fought harder?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes. That is the point. The American boys were absolutely reckless in their daring. There was not a waking hour in which the American boys were not trying to get over the line to get an enemy. Every American boy who had none to his credit could hardly sleep at night until he went out and got one. When they entered a fight they stayed to the finish. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman spoke about two and a half German machines going down to one American machine. Do I understand that was in combat with the American machines, or in contest with the Allies combined?

Mr. LEA of California. With the Americans.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. With the Americans?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Now, a little of the testimony taken out West has crept into this record that I think ought not to be there. It ought not to be in a solemn report made to Congress. A man by the name of Sweeney took the stand. Sweeney was manifestly full of bitterness. He had tried to get a contract with the Government, which was refused. However, Sweeney clearly betrayed he was not a reliable witness, in my judgment. Sweeney told about a circumstance in which he was over in France at Clermont-Ferrand and 16 American planes, according to this story, were going to the front.

The fliers were telling everybody good-bye. Sweeney says those young fellows did not seem to care. "They were laughing and kidding and shaking hands with everybody." He said he asked Williams, who he said was the man in charge, "Why all this gloom?" And then, according to his story, Williams said in substance, "As soon as these American machines go over the front the Germans shoot at them and they immediately take fire and go down, and the American machines that were purchased from the Allies, that these boys have, are so slow and inferior that when they go over the front the Germans run right up onto them and shoot them and they go down." Sweeney said that a month after that time he came back and asked Williams if any of those 16 aviators ever returned; that Williams said he had not heard anything of them, and every one of them must have gone over there and gone down and been captured or killed behind the German lines. According to his story all those machines did was to rise up, fly over the German lines, be shot down, and the aviators captured or killed. That was all there was to it. I looked up the record to find out how much truth there was in Sweeney's testimony. From information furnished I learned Williams was never in charge at Clermont-Ferrand. Clermont-Ferrand was not a place from which battle machines went to the front. It was a training station. On the day that this incident occurred there was not a single casualty in the American aviation list. This miserable hoax, perpetrated upon this committee, is also perpetrated upon Congress in this report. [Applause.]

DEEDS.

The majority report refers to Col. Deeds, and criticizes the Secretary of War and Col. Deeds because Col. Deeds was not court-martialed. I paid no particular attention to that charge, for this reason—the facts were, in substance, these: When Justice Hughes investigated aircraft matters he recommended that Col. Deeds be court-martialed, not because of any crime he had committed against the statutes of the country but for matters I will not take time to mention.

After that recommendation was made the matter was referred to the War Department, and Secretary Baker requested that a board of review make a full investigation of the facts before proceeding with a court-martial. Other matters, not presented to Judge Hughes, were taken before the board of review, and Gen. Ansell, then Acting Judge Advocate General, signed a report asserting in substance that the full facts did not sustain the charge and recommending that Deeds be not prosecuted. Now, on account of that determination, Deeds and Baker are assailed in this report. This committee took no testimony whatever as to the merits of that charge. I thought it was a legitimate and proper course to pursue for the Secretary of War to say, "Allow a full investigation of the facts and find out whether there is anything in this charge or not before you authorize a prosecution." [Applause.]

The majority report says:

Secretary Baker's activity in protecting Deeds against Judge Hughes's finding is at once astonishing and significant. Col. Deeds was thereafter banqueted in Washington and praised by Gen. Squier for his record in aircraft production.

Months ago Gen. Ansell retired from the War Department and is now the attorney of a subcommittee of the War Expenditures Committee engaged in investigating activities of the department of which he was formerly a part.

On the 20th day of January, 1920, Judge Ansell, whose opinion was that Deeds should not be prosecuted, made a speech at Toledo, Ohio, in which he said—I read from a newspaper report:

Gen. Ansell during the course of his address paid a high tribute to Col. E. A. Deeds, of this city, former head of the aviation section of the United States Army. "In my opinion," said the general, "Col. Deeds contributed more favorably to the winning of the war than any other individual in America."

If members of this committee want to be astonished, let them not be astonished at Squier because he gave Deeds a banquet, but rather let them be astonished at the attorney now employed by the subcommittee at $10,000 or $20,000 a year to investigate the War Department. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LEA of California. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Is that the same Gen. Ansell who is under employment by Representative JOHNSON'S subcommittee now at $20,000 a year?

Mr. LEA of California. I do not know the exact amount of the salary, but that is the same man. That is what I say. Now, understand me, I do not purport to pass judgment on the facts concerning Col. Deeds, because this committee took no evidence upon which to base a judgment.

INEXPERIENCE.

The report makes what I believe to be a fundamental error in its conclusions, one that should not be made. It says that responsibility for the failure of our aircraft program rested upon those in authority. The report of the majority is based upon that ground. "Baker was at the head of the War Department, therefore blame him." "Disque was at the head of Spruce Production, therefore blame him." "Ryan was at the head of aircraft matters, therefore blame him." Now, gentlemen, that reasoning absolutely misses the mark. The reason for the disappointments in our aircraft matters, the reason for the failures that we made, are not individual. The reasons are just as plain as the sun in the sky, if you will just carefully review the evidence. To summarize it in a word, the reason we suffered these disappointments was because of our lack of experience and preparation. When the war in Europe began, the United States was fourteenth among the nations of this world in the amount that it had contributed to aviation. We were below China; we were below Bulgaria; we were below Spain. When the war started in Europe the development of the airplane followed under the intense conditions of war. The result was that when we entered this war we were without the experience, we were not even novices in building battle planes. When the war in Europe started America in all her history had never built one battle plane. There was not a factory in America, there was not a designer in America who had made real battle planes. We were not even novices in the game of real battle-machine production. We had made some small types of engines, we had made some training planes, we had made a few machines for the Navy, but no battle planes for the Army, as they were known at that time.

Now, what did we do? We tried to do the only thing we could do. By frantic effort, by the expenditure of vast sums of money, and by the creation of great mushroom organizations, we attempted to meet the giant task thrust upon us. But all the gold of America could not buy time or experience. We could not buy the time or experience necessary to get the most effective results. That is the reason for what failures we made. It was not a failure of individuals, it was the failure of this Nation.

If from our experience we have learned nothing more than to deceive ourselves by venting our wrath upon the heads of a few individuals, we are simply wasting time and have learned nothing by the war. The real fault is the Nation's fault. It is not the fault of any party or of any individual. Before the war America pursued that course that was approved of by the people of America. Our Nation made a mistake. The conservative, intelligent judgment of America ought to recognize it and learn a lesson of value from it.

Criticisms are made of men appointed as heads of aircraft activities on the ground that they were not experienced in the technical side of the operations over which they had control. The big thing in the heads of these various departments was not that they should have the technical knowledge of the details of production. The requirement for heads of these big operations was for men of vision to see, comprehend, and plan; with the practical experience to adopt the means best calculated to produce results; with force enough to execute and bring plans to results. The fundamental requirement was for the executive function and not for the ministerial function of technical operations.

The strong, successful head of English aircraft was a shipbuilder; the equally strong head of the French aircraft program was a business man.

Personal animus, vituperation, or partisan strife solve the problems of no nation. Rather let us learn the lesson that would teach us to avoid repeating in the future the error of yesterday. [Applause.]

SPRUCE PRODUCTION.

There are many matters that can not be discussed in the time here to-day. But hurriedly I want to go over this spruce-production effort made upon the Pacific coast. What was the spruce-production problem? It was to furnish the lumber to maintain the allied planes on the front. There are very few kinds of lumber suitable for aircraft purposes. It had to be light; it had to be strong; it had to stand the test of being pierced by a bullet with little shattering; it had to be procured in large quantities; it had to be straight-grained and not too coarse-grained. It was the judgment of the experts that spruce, of all the lumber available, was the lumber that could be adopted. Oregon and Washington were the sections where that spruce could be procured. An agreement was entered into by the Allies under which America undertook to conduct the spruce operations for the joint benefit and at the joint expense of the Allies. About $49,000,000 was expended, and one-third of that was the burden of the United States. So the financial importance of it to the United States is sixteen or seventeen million dollars, less the salvage value.

Spruce is located in about half the timber of the Northwest Pacific coast. Roughly speaking, 5 per cent of the timber is spruce. In the section where spruce is found about 10 per cent of it on an average exists. Of the 10 per cent in the forests not over 15 per cent of it, as the operations were conducted, was actually usable for airplane purposes. So the problem of spruce production was this: To go into the forests of the West, where the rainfall is 100 inches per annum, and get out of that forest 1½ per cent of actually usable timber for airplane purposes.

In 1917 we were failing in the aircraft program and the Allies were threatened with absolute failure because of the lack of aircraft lumber. The I. W. W.'s were rampant in the West. The worst conditions that we had during the war were there. In addition, a strike in the lumber industry was declared which ran for six weeks. After that the I. W. W.'s were committing sabotage by putting emery in the bearings of engines, driving nails into the logs that were to be sawed, blowing up engines, and setting fire to the forests. That was the condition that confronted America when the Government stepped in and tried to save the aircraft program by producing spruce.

At the close of 1917 this condition confronted the Allies. The demand for spruce for the last five months was 10,000,000 feet a month. In these five months 12,500,000 feet had been produced by the industry. That was only half of what it ought to have been, on account of the labor troubles and the I. W. W.'s. It was demonstrated that the coast would furnish about 5,000,000 feet a month on the average. But what was the situation? The immediately available spruce had been drawn upon because the high price during the year had brought out all of it where it could be had in convenient places. Winter was facing us. The normal production of lumber in the winter falls about 40 per cent, on an average, below the production of the rest of the year.

Up to 1918 the Government did not engage directly in the production of spruce. Then the Government contracted for riving operations; that is, splitting the tree, taking out the portion that was fit for aircraft purposes, and leaving the rest in the forest. That was found to be extravagant, but the necessity for production was so great that it justified any method that would produce spruce and justified the expenditure of every dollar that was necessary to get it at any price. So $1,700,000 for rived spruce under those conditions was paid.

But that operation was practically abandoned with the winter. Early in the year of 1918 the Allies adopted a spruce program in which they demanded that America should furnish 20,000,000 feet a month. When you realize the conditions under which it must be produced you will see that it was a giant task.

PROGRAM OF EXPANSION.

Finally, in the spring the Allies and the United States demanded 30,000,000 feet a month, 23,000,000 for actual needs and 25 per cent to cover submarine losses and other failures of the program. So then the decision was made that has caused most of the criticism that has been made. A plan of expansion was adopted which resulted in an expenditure of probably more than $12,000,000, which produced no lumber before the armistice. That was part of the preparation for 1919.

What were the conditions under which the program was adopted? It was when Great Britain did not know whether they could keep airplanes at the front or not. From the 21st of March, 1918, when the Germans began that successful drive, until the 18th of July it looked like a drive to victory for the Germans. That is when the program was adopted. About the time the drive started Great Britain cabled they must have a million feet of spruce delivered at Galveston in 20 days.

They consulted with the American authorities and it was determined if necessary that they would go into every American aeroplane factory and take every foot of lumber the American factories had and send that lumber across to make allied planes. Then is when it was that this program was adopted, a program of expansion, that involved the construction of 139 miles of railroad, great lines of spur tracks, three sawmills, and two cut-up plants. It was then that the railroad construction began. That is what the criticism is about. The main criticism is about that preparation that never produced results. I say, however, it was a patriotic duty, it was good business judgment that those responsible for spruce production should spend every dollar that was necessary to insure that it would go to the front. [Applause.] If those men had been men of narrow vision, who had their eyes on the American dollar rather than on victory and the American boys at the front, they might have adopted some picayune course. They could have said, "Let the loggers do it," "Let George do it." They could have frittered along with the methods that had prevailed and had failed before. But Gen. Disque in charge, under John D. Ryan, had the foresight, had the courage, and the business judgment to adopt a program that, if carried out, would have absolutely assured the spruce for 1919.

SOLDIER LABOR.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. When was it that they put the soldiers out there?

Mr. LEA of California. The early part of 1918. Here is the situation that was presented at the beginning of 1918: The lumber industry had produced only one-fourth of the 10,000,000 feet a month wanted. A review of the situation clearly demonstrated that a radical change was necessary if we were going to get the lumber. One of the basic evils was the lack of labor. Industry was far below normal as far as the labor supply was concerned. Engineering regiments had been collected from the lumbermen of the Northwest and sent to France. Others had been drafted or volunteered and went away.

Others had gone to machine shops and more remunerative employment. There was a very great shortage of labor. In order to supply that shortage of labor a plan was adopted of taking soldiers there to work in the logging camps and mills. Few of these soldiers worked directly for the Government. They were distributed among the lumbering and the logging companies. Two hundred and thirty-four soldier camps were established on the Pacific coast. These men were paid civilian wages, and they worked side by side with civilians. Their work was not solely to produce aeroplane lumber, but it was also to keep the industry going, so as to furnish lumber for the cantonments, lumber for the ships, the quantity of which demand was vastly greater than for aeroplanes, and also lumber for aeroplanes. They labored beside and were paid civilian wages.

Now, it is suggested that the Secretary of War should be held responsible for the money paid to those soldiers for getting out lumber to carry on the war. Gen. Ansell, by a written opinion, decided the payment of the civilian wages to the soldiers was legal. His ability has not been questioned. If competent to earn the salary paid him by the investigating committee, he must have been qualified to make that decision.

Those soldiers made a great addition to the labor supply. Eventually something like 28,000 soldiers were used in that operation. It has been suggested to this committee that those soldiers so working for our country were peons. The chairman of this committee out at Seattle, in the hotbed of I. W. W.ism and sovietism and Bolshevism, declared that these American soldiers were in peonage. It is an injustice to the soldiers of this Republic for a man to go from the Dome of this Capitol out into the center of I. W .W.ism clothed with the authority of this Government, and declare that the American soldiers were in peonage. I say that it is the duty of the American soldier, wherever he may be in the Army of the United States, to serve his country where the needs of his country require. [Applause.]

DEVELOPMENT ACTIVITIES.

Another thing was perfectly apparent. If this lumber was to be secured in 1918 and 1919 large undeveloped stands of spruce must be developed. Mr. Hawkins, who I think we will all agree was a man of large and successful experience in the logging and lumber business, was the first man to recommend the program of expansion which was finally adopted. While I mention the name of Mr. Hawkins I want to call attention to the fact that Mr. Hawkins was the first man who recommended a connection with Milwaukee for this Clallam County spruce. In order to tap the spruce forests 13 railroads were built. The two largest operations were planned principally to supply the 1919 demand. Four of those railroads, at least, did not haul a log, because they were not completed at the time of the armistice. Nine of those railroads did haul logs that contributed to the lumber supply before the armistice.

A plan of selective logging was adopted. This meant men would go into these forests and instead of logging them clean they would take out only the spruce logs suitable for aeroplane lumber and transport them to the mills without taking the remainder of the forest trees.

Another part of the plan was to build a cut-up plant for the refined sawing of lumber. It was a process of individualization of the sawing of each log to produce the best quality and greatest quantity of usable lumber therefrom. Col. Breece had charge of lumber production. There is probably no man more competent in the United States. The success of the effort was beyond question. The production of usable spruce lumber from the log increased from 50 to 100 per cent.

This plan of expansion also involved the construction of two sawmills in connection with the Clallam County operations, Washington, and one sawmill at Toledo, in the Yaquina district, Oregon. Why were these mills erected when there were 400 or more sawmills in the West? The reason was plain. This sawmill at Toledo was 150 miles from other mills that could handle the logs. The freight was $3.17 a thousand. These other mills charged $12 a thousand for sawing. Col. Breece said that in the mills established by the Government he could saw the lumber for $5 a thousand. He said in the operation of this mill he could save the Government $1,800 a day.

In addition to that, Toledo had transcontinental terminal freight rates. The lumber could be shipped from the mill at Toledo to the Atlantic seaboard just as cheaply as from Portland, and thus eliminate all of the useless freight from Toledo to the mills. So there was a perfectly good reason, a good business reason. Col. Breece, one of the best business men in the sawmill business in the United States, was responsible for the location and construction of that mill.

YAQUINA RAILROAD.

While mentioning that territory I want to refer to the location of the railroad built north from Yaquina Bay. Toledo and Siletz Basin promoters condemned the route selected and insisted it should have been built directly north from Toledo into Siletz Basin. The railroad constructed by the Government paralleled the shore of the Pacific and tapped the west slope watershed timber with a practical route for its extension into the northerly part of the Siletz Basin to reach its principal spruce stands should later demands so require.

How was the route of that road determined? Why, it was selected as any business man would want it selected. When the controversy arose Gen. Disque had the location of the spruce stands and routes thereto investigated by two very experienced and practical men, acting independently of each other. Each recommended the course that was then followed by the Government. Mr. Benson, whose name is a synonym for integrity in Oregon, and whose experience in the lumber business is lifelong, and who is now out of the business and unselfishly interested, spent two months in making a careful investigation, reported there was no doubt about where the railroad ought to be; that it ought to be where the Government did build it.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. I understood the gentleman justified the payment of civilian wages to those soldiers up there?

Mr. LEA of California. I did.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, in that case would the gentleman think that it would be out of the way to pay civilian wages to the men who were on the front in France in the way of compensation?

Mr. LEA of California. I am with the gentleman on the bonus, if that is what you mean. Now, going to this railroad question—Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 1 hour and 25 minutes.

LUMBER PRODUCTION.

Mr. LEA of California. Several places in the report charge a failure of production under Gen. Disque's management on the Pacific coast. Only a misunderstanding of the record could justify such a contention. The spruce airplane production for the last five months of 1917 was 12,500,000 feet. From an average of two and one-half million feet per month produced by the industry in 1917 under Disque's management, spruce production reached 11,000,000 feet per month in October, 1918, with a total airplane production, including fir, of over 20,000,000 per month. Fir was a substitute used for spruce. Inasmuch as it weighed 25 per cent more and consequently lessened the climbing power and speed of airplanes and had less bullet-resisting power, it was not the most desirable. The desire of the aircraft authorities was to eventually secure more spruce and use less of fir, particularly in fighting machines.

The Canadian production, with which it is sought to discredit American production, consisted of 26,500,000 feet, produced as a result of over 10 months' effort, only 18,000,000 feet of which was produced before the armistice. Under Canadian specifications, their lumber represented only 50 per cent of usable material as contrasted with American. Their proportion of wing-beam stock, the most important quality required, equaled probably not more than one-fifth of the proportionate American product from the log.

While the general lumber industry increased 7 per cent in 1918 over 1917, spruce production increased 50 per cent in that period. Through the spruce production effort under Disque, 50 to 100 per cent more usable aircraft lumber was secured from the log. Through his management 17,000 soldiers, located on 200 different operations, contributed to the lumber supply of 1918. Nine of the 13 logging railroads built were operated and contributed to the production of 1918. The riving operations in spruce produced 7 per cent of the total spruce production of 1918. The cost-plus loggers had 104,000,000 feet of spruce logs on hand at the armistice. Under Disque's management the loggers in the industry were encouraged to develop new stands of spruce and financial support was given them for that purpose. Although the cut-up plant did not get into quantity operation until March, 79,000,000 feet of the total aircraft lumber produced came from the saws of the Government cut-up plant. At the time of the armistice the spruce loggers were producing 33 per cent of all the spruce logs being produced in the Northwest. This contention in the report is doubtless made without careful consideration. For instance, the statement that no logs were produced under the Poulson operation, under which $1,600,000 settlement was made, is not accurate in that over 13,000,000 feet of selected spruce logs were delivered from that operation.

There are probably not two consecutive pages in the report of the majority that do not contain inaccuracies and statements from which the reader may draw wrong conclusions, such as I have in some instances pointed out. The number of such cases precludes a detailed discussion of them. If the reader of the report will bear in mind that the man at the head of the spruce production effort had business intelligence, was patriotic, and of good intentions; that he was surrounded by men of like qualities and of long business experience and judgment in the lumber and logging industries, and as disinterested as men could be in the Northwest; that Gen. Disque acted in harmony with them in carrying out the operations of the Government and with their cooperation and advice, he will be protected against many of the inferences that otherwise he might draw.

CLALLAM SPRUCE CONTRACT.

A contract was made with the Siems-Carey Kerbaugh Co. to log the spruce in the Clallam County operations and to saw it into flitches. Their contract called for the delivery of at least 250,000,000 feet within one year from the beginning of operations, not less than 10,000,000 feet to be delivered in December, with larger amounts required in later months.

Mr. Ryan is criticized for changing the terms of the contract originally proposed, providing for the delivery of 300,000,000 feet within the year, but requiring only 500,000 feet per month for many months after operations began. Under the originally proposed contract the contractor was responsible for the delivery of only a trivial amount of spruce within any practical period.

The contract as reformed required the delivery of a minimum of 10,000,000 feet per month, thus assuring definite results.

The contract permitted the Government to change sawing specifications at its discretion. Under this provision the Government had power to make changes that would greatly affect the cost of the operation. Very properly it contained a provision that if the contractor could, after investigation by the Government, show that he was making a profit of less than 7 per cent, the contract could be terminated at the option of either party or the contractor be required to continue the contract on a profit basis of 7 per cent.

Operations under the contract were never converted to a cost-plus basis and it was never operated as a cost-plus contract. On account of the termination of the contract by the conclusion of the war, settlement was made with the contractor on a basis of 7 per cent profit.

Under the terms of the contract the contractor was entitled to no profit unless he performed his agreement. In other words, the Government was to get what spruce it contracted for or the contractor received no profits. In that respect this contract was one of the most drastic and effective contracts made during the war. In view of the failures of spruce production before the Government's operations, no one earnestly interested in spruce production would have complained of a 7 per cent or greater profit if results were obtained as agreed.

The contention that the contractor assumed no financial responsibility in view of the fact that he was entitled to no profit unless he delivered the spruce is manifestly groundless. A number of men associated with the logging industry testified that performance of the contract on account of its magnitude was impossible. Doubtless it was impossible to men not used to large contracting operations. The contractor in this case, however, had an experience in the contracting business and employed assistants experienced in the logging business which gave an assurance that the performance would be accomplished. Without performance the contract was not especially profitable. Even if converted to a 7 per cent basis, in view of the 80 per cent income-tax law, with success, even if they did make a liberal profit, none would have rejoiced more than those most earnestly interested in the success of the American cause.

A suggestion is made that Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Co. had designs on monopolizing the lumber industry in the Northwest. The suggestion emanates from a small coterie in the industry who have themselves been accused of the same design. They opposed anybody else working on the same side of the street.

The substantial fact is that the contractors had a right to exercise their option under the contract to purchase certain Government properties at the conclusion of the war if they saw fit to do so, but did not exercise that option, although it was desirable from the Government standpoint that they should do so.

CLALLAM RAILROAD.

Complaint is made of the cost of the Crescent Railroad. The cost of this railroad was not at all out of line with war prices. The road was designed to carry over one million and a half feet of logs per day, beginning with winter operation. That would have required over 200 loaded cars one way per day. Logs are among the severest traffic hauled on railroads. The traffic in weight would have more than equaled that of most transcontinental railroads. The war purpose for which the material was required demanded continuous operation, certainty, and speed.

Those responsible for the building of this railroad and conducting the war-supply operations were required to subordinate economy to the demands for speed and quantity production. If in a spirit of parsimony dollars had been balanced against possible defeat and additional loss of lives at the front, it would have been an unpardonable offense against patriotic citizenship of America and our boys at the front. Those who would have deliberately pursued such a course would not have been forgiven as long as their names were remembered in America.

During the war the spirit of America demanded speed and results and not parsimony.

Additional construction costs, with the decreased efficiency of labor, during the war averaged from 100 to 200 per cent.

Considering the mountainous character of the country traversed, the grading, and the dense timber to be uprooted and cleared away, $45,000 or $50,000 per mile would probably have been a minimum cost of constructing this road under the slower and more economical methods of peace-time operations before the war. The work on this road is admittedly well done. The job was accomplished with a speed perhaps seldom equaled in the history of railroad construction. The price was high, but not higher than competent management and speedy, substantial construction, and high labor and material costs required.

SELECTION OF ROUTE.

Just a brief reference to the selection of the route of this railroad in Clallam County. This is a question that has caused criticism, particularly in reference to Mr. Ryan [illustrating on map]. Here is Port Angeles on the south side of the Straits of northwestern Washington. This is the route of the Milwaukee Railroad that has terminal connections and runs westerly across here to a place called Deep Creek. Here in northwest Washington is the area that the Government selected for the purpose of getting spruce for the 1919 program. Lake Pleasant was adopted as the center of forest operations. It was selected for a sawmill site and was to be used for log storage and booming. At Port Angeles the Government built another mill, which, with the Lake Pleasant mill, was designed when in full operation to handle the lumber that came from this section.

The question, so far as a railroad was concerned, was how to reach the center of this spruce area to carry out the timber. Four routes were proposed. One was this route by Clallam Bay, which required both rail and water transportation. That required an average of about 26 miles of rail haul and 46 miles of towing. [Illustrating.] The other route was the proposed road from Port Angeles by the south side of Lake Crescent to Lake Pleasant. An extension to Lake Pleasant from the end of the Milwaukee at Deep Creek was the principal suggestion. This route [pointing to map] connecting operations at Lake Pleasant with the Milwaukee at Joyce was selected. The route selected required 8 or 10 miles more construction than the extension from the end of the Milwaukee would have required.

How was that route selected? By looking at the map as if the country was a flat table anybody would say that the practical route was to extend the Milwaukee. Now, Col. Disque, and the Secretary of War following his recommendation, Col. Disque not having been there, but basing his action on reports, recommended the extension of the Milwaukee.

Finally Col. Disque came to Washington and took the matter up. Mr. Cary, the prospecting contractor, after examining the surveyed profiles for the Milwaukee extension and viewing the two routes, concluded that on account of the physical conditions involved the extension could not be completed before the winter rains. Mr. Cary was a member of one of the strongest contracting firms in the United States. They had a contract for $150,000,000 of construction work in China. The road, when completed, would be required to handle an immense heavy traffic from the beginning in winter. The Milwaukee extension had to be built for miles along the side of steep clay mountains. Cary declared such a road, if completed, could not be kept open and carry such heavy traffic during the first winter. One of these mountains through which this route goes has a name that indicates a sliding character. One of the witnesses before this committee testified that the mountain was sliding for 2 miles. I think that is an exaggeration. But the fact is that this Milwaukee extension was through a clay soil in a steep mountain country.

Anybody who knows anything about railroads knows you can not build a railroad and finish it at the beginning of winter and operate heavy trains over it in the winter with clay fills. There were places where its construction would require cuts on the mountain side 150 feet deep. The route selected, called the "Crescent route," had rocky or gravelly soil nearly its whole length.

The question of finally selecting the route was referred to Gen. Disque. He did not decide overnight or without a careful effort to act intelligently. He secured a disinterested engineer from the Union Pacific, who went over these routes and examined the surveyors' notes and profiles. He reported in favor of the Crescent route. The fact that it was the best route is demonstrated by the fact that in the winter following the construction of this road it had comparatively trifling interference from slides, although at one place it did slide for 200 feet.

RELATION TO MILWAUKEE.

The suggestion is made that this route was selected for the convenience of the Milwaukee. Now, you must credit the Milwaukee with brains if not virtue. The Milwaukee owns over 65,000 acres of timber in this territory. Eighteen large tracts of that timber were along the route of the Milwaukee if extended. Only six tracts of minor importance had timber contributory to the Crescent route as selected. All of these were reasonably accessible to the Milwaukee extension. The Milwaukee purchased all its vast holdings of timber before it extended a mile of its road westerly from Port Angeles. Its road, so far as constructed, as well as the proposed Deep Creek extension to Lake Pleasant, were selected by it as the route best calculated to serve its interests. Any contention that the Milwaukee preferred the Crescent route not only ignores the fact that the Milwaukee opposed that route but must also be based upon a conclusion, unsupported by the evidence, that the Milwaukee had changed its mind as to the best route for serving its own interests. In buying its timber along the Deep Creek extension, in surveying therefrom to Lake Pleasant, and in building its road to Deep Creek, the Milwaukee had demonstrated beyond question the route it preferred.

Only by unhampered use of the imagination can one support the conclusion that the Milwaukee's interest was to be served by the Crescent Lake route over the Deep Creek extension.

The determination of Disque to connect Lake Pleasant with the Milwaukee was made weeks before Ryan was in the Aircraft Service. The fact is, of the four routes proposed to connect with this spruce, every one of them was supported by selfish interests but one. That one was the route selected. I do not say that in any discreditable sense. So far as I know each of the interests concerned advocated the route in which it was interested honorably.

The Clallam route was favored by a timber company whose interests would have been favored by the Government construction of a railroad that after the war would in effect have been their property to serve their timber interests. The Port Angeles road was favored by those who for some time had been interested in promoting an independent road from that city through the timber section at Lake Pleasant and southerly therefrom. The extension of the Milwaukee was favored by that company because it was on the route selected by them along the line of their timber and a desired development of their enterprise. The sponsors for the Crescent route, the one selected, so far as disclosed had no motive other than to serve the Government's interests by getting out spruce certainly and in adequate quantities.

In a report sent the Secretary of War from Portland the majority of this committee suggested that "further investigation may disclose conditions of which a recovery can be had against John D. Ryan and others" for several million dollars spent in building this railroad.

Manifestly this reflection is based upon conjecture as to possibilities instead of upon foundations of fact.

At the time the construction of this road was determined upon no material was more pressingly needed at the front than aircraft lumber. The attempt to provide it in adequate quantities was patriotic and commendable. There is no more moral or legal reason why we should recover that cost from Mr. Ryan than there is for suing John Pershing for the powder fired at the enemy by the American soldiers at Chateau-Thierry.

The extension of the Milwaukee route was supported by the Milwaukee to the hour the decision was made. The route built was selected over the opposition of the Milwaukee to the very last minute. That fact is established without contradiction in evidence. [Applause.] To say that the Milwaukee wanted this road built and that it was built to serve the interests of the Milwaukee is a monstrous injustice to the men in charge of this operation. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has 1 hour and 10 minutes remaining and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has 35 minutes remaining.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred gentlemen are present, a quorum, and the gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has so thoroughly covered the subject of the investigation made by this subcommittee and the subject of the majority and minority reports that I will touch upon only a few phases of the subject. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] indicated that this was water that had passed over the wheels, and if it was not for the fact that efforts had been made in some places to discredit the conduct of the investigation by this committee, that he would agree that nothing should be done about it. I think from the standpoint of the majority of this committee it is unfortunate that anybody said anything that these gentlemen could construe as being an effort to disparage their efforts, for I do not think the investigation or the majority report has been creditable to the gentlemen who made it or in the least helpful to the country. [Applause.]

I have been very much delighted, Mr. Chairman, at the splendid statement of the aircraft record of this country, made by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], and I have been delighted at the tributes he has paid to the heroism of the American soldier and the glories achieved in the Great War by the American Army; but I have been a little disappointed not to hear one suggestion of applause or approval from the Republican side at the touching tributes to our armies and our boys who won such glories for our flag upon the battle fields of France. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The aircraft situation was one of the most difficult propositions that our country had to deal with when we entered the war.

On the 6th of April, 1917, this country was the least prepared in aircraft of any important nation in the world. The situation is summarized in a pamphlet compiled at the request of the Assistant Secretary of War, entitled "United States Army aircraft production facts," pages 5 and 6, as follows:

First. The Army had practically no material, personnel, nor experience in the designing, producing, or using of aeronautical equipment. The books of the Signal Corps show that during eight years prior to 1916, 59 airplanes were ordered and received, while during 1917 366 were ordered and only 83 were received. In other words, the total number of airplanes that had been delivered to the Signal Corps prior to 1917 was 142. A large portion of these were already obsolete or destroyed. Not one of them was suitable for use on the battle front.

Second. The country had no accurate knowledge of the aircraft requirements of modern war. No one knew the engine or plane requirements; no one knew the requirements for instruments, ordnance, and armament; neither data nor experience existed in the United States from which this vital information could be obtained; no airplane made in America up to this time had mounted a machine gun or carried other than the simplest instruments; radiotelegraph and telephone, cameras, and bombing equipment, night flying lights, aviator's clothing, suitable compasses, and other instruments were practically unheard of.

Third. Adequate manufacturing facilities for the protection of aeronautical equipment of the war type did not exist in this country.

Fourth. There was no definite understanding how much aircraft equipment would be required for the use of the Army or Navy, and therefore no program to work to.

Five officers who had received a special course in aeronautics constituted the entire trained personnel of the Air Service of the United States, and 194 men, with practically no equipment, comprised the entire personnel—civil and military.

When the armistice was signed the record shows a total of more than 195,000 men in service, of whom we had in France nearly 79,000 officers and men and to whom had been delivered 16,952 airplanes—a remarkable achievement to have been accomplished in 19 months. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I think, Mr. Chairman, this is a remarkable achievement for our aircraft service to have accomplished in the short period of 19 months from the time we entered the war. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think, instead of a committee of Congress undertaking by insinuation and innuendo—not to use stronger terms—to bring the men who had charge of this service and who devoted their time and their intellect and their energies to it into disrepute before the American people, they should give them the great credit which is their due for this splendid achievement. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has well said that the fault was not with the men who had charge of this matter during those 19 months. The fault was back behind them. In 1908 the Wright brothers at Fort Myer, in the presence of the President of the United States, demonstrated the success of the aeroplanes, showed to the world that it was to be a great engine of war in the future. President Roosevelt witnessed that, and though he was President for one year afterwards there was no effort on the part of the Republican Congress or this great Republican President to utilize this American invention, so that America would be prepared if it ever needed aircraft in time of war. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Another Republican President came in. Two years of his administration went by, and not one dollar was appropriated for aircraft. And not until the day before a Democratic House of Representatives was to assemble in this Chamber did a Republican Congress appropriate one cent for aircraft, and then the small appropriation of $100,000 was made on the 3d day of March, 1911. An appropriation of another $100,000 was made the next year. But up to the time the Great War engulfed the world in 1914 America had appropriated for the purpose of studying and investigating this great machine of destruction and building aircraft but one-half million of dollars.

Germany had seen what it meant and had appropriated and utilized $28,000,000. France had appropriated $22,000,000, and, as the gentleman from California said, 14 nations of the earth had made greater appropriations and greater progress in the development of aircraft than the United States had. The blame is not to be placed upon the men who of a sudden had to develop this great and scientific engine of war but upon those who failed in the years before to appreciate the importance of aircraft, failed when other nations were developing it, and when we should have done so and would have done so if our people, if our Secretaries of War and our Presidents and our Congresses had possessed the foresight that other nations possessed in reference to this matter.

In March, 1916, Mr. Baker, whom this report criticizes so severely, was made Secretary of War, and in that very month he did what his belligerent predecessor had not done, namely, he asked Congress to give him an appropriation of half a million dollars for the study of aircraft, and Congress promptly did so. In the month of August he asked for an appropriation of $13,000,000 and received it. But we had no men here who understood the building of the Army machines, whether of the training type or of the service type. We had no factories. We had no devices. We had no way to proceed to use this money. We sent men abroad that they might study in the allied countries the devices that they had for aircraft, but these countries, as we were neutral, would not give our officers the information that was desired or access to that information, and so the year 1916 went by and our country was still without men and without factories and without devices for building aircraft that was suitable for warfare. And the foresight and enterprise of our great Secretary of War, through no fault of his, brought but small results.

And when war was forced upon us on April 6, 1917, we were absolutely without any machines that could be used upon the battle front.

Then our officials in charge of aircraft proceeded to do the only thing they could do. They sent commissions abroad; they sent students and officers abroad. Col. Bolling's commission made the arrangement which the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] discussed, by which this country was to furnish certain classes of engines and planes and certain material, and the allied countries were to furnish us in return the fighting planes that were to be used for pursuit purposes.

The Signal Corps was in charge of our Aircraft Service until May 14, 1918, when the Bureau of Aircraft Production was established and Mr. John T. Ryan was made director. This bureau was vested with full, complete, and exclusive jurisdiction and control over the production of airplanes, airplane engines, and aircraft equipment for the use of the Army, and to that end was authorized to assume control and jurisdiction over all pending Government projects having to do or connected with the production of aircraft.

Mr. Ryan at once took charge and devoted his entire time to the study and direction of this important matter. One billion dollars, from first to last, was expended on aircraft. This includes every expenditure of every kind, the purchase of machines of France and England and Italy, for equipping our men, for training, for every purpose. And yet this report tells you that $1,000,000,000 was "wasted." We sent to the battle front thousands of splendidly equipped American air fighters, everyone of whom had been trained and equipped out of this money. [Applause on Democratic side.] And yet this report gives not the slightest credit for it.

When, on September 18, at the St. Mihiel salient the American soldiers went over to the front, we had there with the First Army the largest concentration of air forces ever gotten together in the World War, one-third of which were Americans and two-thirds were French, British, and Italian squadrons operating under American command. [Applause on Democratic side.] These contributed largely to the glorious results achieved by the American Army on those September days. All the equipment for that magnificent effort was paid for, so far as the American fliers and the American machines were concerned, out of this $1,000,000,000, which you are told in this report was "absolutely wasted." [Applause on Democratic side.]

The majority report is largely an attack upon individuals, especially upon Mr. John T. Ryan, who became Director of Aircraft Production on May 21, 1918, and as my time is limited I shall use it to point out to the House the services of this splendid American in this connection and to show how unjust and unfounded are the criticisms of the report and those of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] are.

When war was declared in 1917 Mr. Ryan was the active directing head of the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., the United Metals Selling Co., and the Montana Power Co., and was also associated in the direction and management of numerous other industrial and financial enterprises, in the success of which not alone his business reputation but his personal fortune was largely involved.

Past the age for active military service, he was an exemplar of the type of successful American business man who was ready, without considering personal results, to place his talents and abilities at the disposal of his country in any capacity to which he was called.

While the country was making every effort, awakened from its long lethargy, to create forces of destruction made necessary by the war call, another effort that was its counterpart in the scope of the vision that prompted it and that astonished the world with its success was inaugurated. Its object was to muster into organization, upon a scale never before attempted, the agencies of mercy, so that from the time the American boy left his home until the hour when he was brought back from the front line, on foreign soil, his wants were cared for and he was furnished such comfort as was possible under the cold, hard realities of war.

The story of the American Red Cross is one of the epics of the war. When the gentleman who had assumed its leadership had outlined his plan he began to build an organization, and, informed by his intimate acquaintance with the best organizing and business brains of the country, he knew exactly where to go, and the record achieved by the organization demonstrated the accuracy of his judgment.

In July, 1917, Mr. Ryan was called to the post of director general of military relief. He accepted without hesitation, dropped his business and personal activities, took a desk in the Red Cross Building in Washington, and until after the armistice was signed gave himself wholly and completely in one position or another to the service of his country. He became a member of the war council of the organization and assisted in directing its activities until from every village in this country to the front-line trench the whole was an energized organization pulsating with patriotic fervor and working with unceasing devotion to help the national cause.

In this position he remained until May, 1918, when, without previous notice, he was summoned by the Secretary of War, at the request of the President, to take charge of the Aircraft Production Bureau. This appointment, according to the record, came without solicitation on his part. It was a call to duty, and, without weighing or considering personal consequences, he responded.

It was an unpromising and difficult task to which Mr. Ryan was called, and to which he was formally appointed on May 21, 1918. Six months later, on October 25, the report of Hon. Charles E. Hughes was submitted to the Attorney General. An extract therefrom forms a part of the majority report. The following excerpt is from the extract so embodied:

> It is not within the province of this report to make recommendations with respect to administrative matters, but it should be said that under the administration of Mr. Ryan and Mr. Potter there has been improvement in organization and progress has been made in gratifying measure.

This statement from an investigator whose judgment has been generally accepted by the American people is of itself an answer to the insinuations contained in the majority report.

So far as Mr. Ryan is concerned, two queries are, it seems to me, pertinent: First, What are the principal criticisms of his administration?—for it is important to keep in mind that no direct charge of either malfeasance or nonfeasance is made; and, second, What, if anything, did Mr. Ryan do as Director of Aircraft Production that demonstrated his capability to handle the duty he had assumed and his patriotic devotion to it?

When one examines the utterances of the majority report, with its constant reference to Mr. Ryan, one looks somewhat expectantly to the succeeding page, anticipating that some specific charge will be made, the truth of which can be demonstrated, but such is not the case. With an unenviable ability, the whole mass is impregnated with insinuations and innuendo, but what specific statements are made in their particular application to Mr. Ryan?

First, that Mr. Ryan and Mr. Potter had been connected with large financial interests before the war. Surely there is no crime involved in this statement of fact. Again the report continues:

> The intimate connection of these powerful interests and of Mr. Potter and Mr. Ryan with Secretary Baker, representing the Government, has never been explained.

What was there to explain? Potter entered unostentatiously the Government service early in 1918, and, by his demonstrated ability, had become Chief of the Equipment Division. Ryan was then in the Red Cross organization. He assumed charge of aircraft in May, 1918, and yet the insinuation is that there was a conspiracy somewhere involving the Secretary of War, Mr. Ryan, and Mr. Potter. The petty character of this sort of insinuation is difficult to characterize.

Second, criticism is directed against Mr. Ryan because in July he went to Portland, Oreg., and, in the words of the majority report—> returning from his 6,000-mile trip in August, and after a few days spent in the East, sailed for Europe in August, in company with Secretary of War Baker, who had made Mr. Ryan also an Assistant Secretary of War a day or so before they sailed. Both remained away until October 13, or shortly before the end of the war. Apart from the two trips that took him away from aircraft duties in Washington for several months, Mr. Ryan had large private business interests and other duties to care for.

This criticism is an example of the complete lack of fairness that characterizes the entire report. If the intended inference to be drawn from the statements made was correct, no condemnation could be too severe. To read the report without additional information, one would inevitably come to the conclusion that Mr. Ryan was engaged in taking pleasure junkets and in attending to his private business. What are the facts?

Directing his energies first to the work of organizing the department from headquarters in Washington, he spent his time practically continuously there, taking occasion, as opportunity presented, to go to the principal manufacturing points in the East, visiting the different factories, and endeavoring to stimulate a spirit of cooperation and to effect a coordination of effort.

The spruce production had been, from the beginning, a matter of tremendous importance, and it was imperative that, in obedience to repeated calls demanding that he should do so, he hastened West in the latter part of July, and by continuous travel visited the large production camps, examined into the manner in which the business was being conducted in the different localities, investigated the organization that had been created to carry on the work, taking occasion to address meetings comprising business men, loggers, lumbermen, workers, and soldiers—acrimoniously referred to as "banquets" in the report—in an effort to secure the utmost that patriotic effort could do in meeting the tremendous task that had been placed upon the United States to furnish lumber, not alone for herself but for all her allies as well.

His trip cut short by a telegraphic request from the Secretary of War, he returned to Washington and in a few days accompanied the Secretary, at his request and at the request of Gen. Pershing, to Europe to endeavor to coordinate the activities of all the Allies and settle definitely an aircraft program for the coming year of then expected hostilities.

The purpose of this trip and what was accomplished by it was:

First, the coordination of aircraft activity between France, England, and the United States. The Allies were calling for engines and for spruce, and our own troops for completed airplanes. The transport service was inadequate. Troops, munitions, food supplies, and all sorts were congesting the docks, backing up the flow of war material from embarkation camp, munition factory, and warehouse to the front, while every available foot of shipping space was crowded to capacity in the effort that was being made to get the same across the Atlantic.

Of what avail would it have been to have built aircraft of huge bulk in constantly increasing numbers if shipping space could not be furnished to take them across? How much better for America to get out the engines, lumber, and other necessaries that could be compressed into reasonable space and let the assembling be largely done on the other side. These and a multiplicity of other problems were demanding attention, and above all was the urgent necessity of coming to a definite understanding with the allied Governments for an established program. As a result of the trip, it will be observed that the following were achieved:

First. The adoption of a definite aircraft program toward which united effort for 1919 requirements could be directed.

Second. An open understanding of the entire situation by the mutual exchange of views by the responsible heads of the respective Governments.

Third. The agreement to deliver to France 1,500 Liberty "12" engines by December 31, 1918, and 750 engines per month during the first six months of 1919.

Fourth. The agreement to deliver 5,500 Liberty engines to the British during the last three months of 1918 and the first six months of 1919, in response to their official request for at least 1,000 engines per month during that period.

Fifth. The definite coordination of these deliveries with our own requirements, which called for 22,500 Liberty "12" engines for our Army and Navy.

This program was carried out to the letter and continued until the suspension of deliveries was mutually agreed upon. In payment for the engines so delivered the sum of $37,871,968.60 was paid to our Government.

How small is the Americanism of those who, for partisan purpose, will minimize our own achievement and seek to discredit not alone the profound accomplishment of America in developing an engine that was given such a practical indorsement as the above, but who will likewise calumniate the men who made the achievement possible.

The third concrete criticism rests upon the alleged connection of Mr. Ryan with the Spruce Production Division and the so-called Siems-Carey contracts. These matters are fully dealt with in Mr. Ryan's testimony, that this enterprise had been inaugurated and had, in part, reached a definite stage long before Mr. Ryan had any connection with the Aircraft Service.

On April 12, 1918, before the Bureau of Aircraft Production had been created, or Mr. Ryan had ever been suggested as director, the Spruce Production Division had agreed with the Siems, Carey-H. S. Kerbaugh Corporation, upon the terms of a contract under which the latter corporation was to furnish 300,000,000 feet of spruce within 18 months from the date of the contract. The delivery was to begin at the rate of 500,000 feet per month within six months from the date of the contract. The entire matter was conditioned, however, upon the Government extending within six months' time a railroad from some point upon the Seattle, Port Angeles & Western Railway, a subsidiary of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, to a terminal point at Lake Pleasant, in order that facilities for transporting rails, sawmill machinery, and so forth, into the field of actual lumbering operations might be furnished, and that the cut of the mills might be transported therefrom.

From the foregoing it will be observed that there were two separate, independent, and distinct operations contemplated:

(a) The necessary extension of a railway to Lake Pleasant, the site which had been chosen for the sawmill.

(b) The spruce-production operation itself, which involved the building of logging tracks, the opening up of the spruce tract, and the sawing and delivery of the spruce flitches.

It was a matter of supreme importance and had to be acted upon at once, if preparation for the 1919 campaign was to be made, as the season was advancing, and advantage would necessarily have to be taken of the summer months for construction. More than 30 miles of railroad were to be built, not of a logging type as frequently indicated in the report, but an industrial railroad, capable of handling several hundred cars per day. Terminals, yards, and sidings had to be established, a huge sawmill constructed, lumber camps built, and more than 80 miles of logging railway extended into the woods.

As the whole operation depended upon the building of the railway to Lake Pleasant, the matter came first to Mr. Ryan's attention. He had been for years a director of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway and a member of the executive committee of that corporation. As soon as he ascertained that the railroad was to connect with the St. Paul Railway, and that from a point of junction to tidewater the lumber produced would of necessity be transported over its rails, he immediately went to the Secretary of War, notified him of the exact situation, and asked to be relieved from any connection of any kind with any negotiation or transaction in connection with the railway project. The Secretary of War agreed to this, and the matter was turned over to Mr. E. R. Stettinius, Second Assistant Secretary of War, who consummated the negotiations with reference to this transaction.

There is and never has been any question about this matter, and, in the language of Mr. McGee, addressing Mr. Ryan upon the hearing, while the latter was testifying before the committee—

It was the manly position for you to take.

The Siems-Carey contract for spruce production, however, was an entirely different matter. With it neither the St. Paul Railway nor any other concern with which Mr. Ryan was affiliated, or had ever been associated, had anything whatever to do. Moreover, the railway contract having been decided, there was a definite, fixed contract, signed as above mentioned on April 12, regarding this feature of the transaction. I do not think I can do better than to insert an excerpt from Mr. Ryan's statement concerning this transaction:

I found a contract executed by Siems, Carey-H. S. Kerbaugh (Inc.) for the sale of 300,000,000 feet of spruce lumber. I had no doubt but that the men connected with this organization were capable—their responsibility was amply assured—the matter was pressing, and it never occurred to me to undo what had been done. To do so would have been wholly unjustified. Instead I devoted myself to endeavoring to improve, in the interest of the Government, the contract which had been made. How well that duty was performed a comparison of the provisions of the two contracts will disclose. I wish to call attention, however, to the following particulars, without implying any criticism to anyone in connection with the prior negotiation.

The contract of April 12, 1918, was a straight contract for the purchase of 300,000,000 feet of spruce to be delivered within a period of 18 months. My chief objections to the contract were that there was no provision enabling the Government to cancel the contract so long as the contractors were reasonably complying with its provisions; there would have been no legal right to terminate the contract in the event of the cessation of the war; no opportunity whereby the Government could take over the operation itself without trying out in court, first, the question of diligence. Moreover, the specific dates at which specific deliveries of spruce would begin in quantity were not fixed, the only requirements being that 500,000 feet should be shipped inside of six months, and that thereafter 500,000 feet per month should be shipped.

The contract as finally executed by me on May 18, 1918, called for deliveries beginning 10,000,000 feet December, 1918, increasing until 26,000,000 feet should be reached by July, 1919, and maintained thereafter until November, 1919, when a total of 250,000,000 feet would have been delivered under the contract.

The price in the old contract was $100 per thousand, board measure, for No. 1, and $60 per thousand, board measure, for No. 2. This price was not changed in the new contract. Provision was made, however, under which the contract could be terminated at any time by the Secretary of War, when the public interest required, upon giving 30 days' notice in writing, and also for the taking over of the contract upon the following conditions:

If it should be determined at the instance of the contractors that the contract would not equal the net cost of performance plus a profit of 7 per cent, the Secretary of War, after investigation and determination of the facts, was enabled to take over the contract or revise the price so as to net the contractor 7 per cent. Moreover, the contract limited the contractor to a profit of 15 per cent, and the obligation was imposed to repay, upon the conclusion of the contract and an audit of the contractor's books, all sums in excess of 15 per cent. Moreover, the Government had the right to acquire, upon the completion of the contract, all of the property which the contractor would have acquired upon paying an appraised value therefor. This limitation of 15 per cent was, in the public interest, removed as a matter of final negotiation, provided the contract should, beginning with the month of February, 1919, and thereafter and consecutively, including the month of November, 1919, increase the amount which he was under obligation to ship by 5,000,000 feet of flitches per month, so that there should be a total of 15,000,000 in excess of each 3 months' period and a total of 50,000,000 excess in the 10 months' period which elapsed from February, 1919, to November, 1919.

While the majority report teems with innuendo and insinuation, the foregoing constitute the only matters toward which concrete criticism is directed. Viewed in the light of the facts that existed, how little justification is there for the attack that has been made. On the other hand, by comparison it may not be inappropriate to refer briefly to a few things that Mr. Ryan did accomplish while head of the Aircraft Bureau. It should be remembered that from the time when he took office until the signing of the armistice less than six months elapsed. Six months is a short time, but the following facts stand out beyond contradiction:

First. Mr. Ryan whipped the aircraft organization into line, improving it so that, in the language of Judge Hughes, "progress has been made in gratifying measure."

Second. He visited practically every manufacturing plant in the country engaged in aircraft production, from the engine factories on the Atlantic to the most remote logging camps on the Pacific, bearing a message of patriotic endeavor and urging the necessity for speed and efficiency.

Third. He went to Europe and effected a complete understanding with our allies as to a definite program to which all could work, and fulfilled, as has been shown, to the letter America's part of the program.

Fourth. He took up the contracts that had been made with manufacturers and forced adujstment, reducing commitments in the single item of Liberty engines alone the sum of $36,562,500.

Fifth. He replaced cost-plus contracts at a bogie price of $5,000 per engine plus a fixed profit of $625 with straight, fixed-price contracts at $4,000 per engine. Inasmuch as the total contracts placed called for the manufacture of 100,993 engines, the amount saved, and that would have been saved had the program been completed, is apparent.

Sixth. While he was in charge of the service he saw the delivery of engines increased from 2,517 in May to 5,297 in October.

Seventh. He was met by requirements, stated at a conference held in May, 1918, in which military representatives of British, French, Italian, and the United States Governments participated, of 30,000,000 feet of aircraft lumber per month. He saw the fulfillment of this requirement easily within reach when the armistice was signed.

These constitute a list of achievements that any man might be proud of, achievements that reflect credit upon him, upon his Government, and upon his country, and which should bring praise from every patriotic American citizen and every man who believes in a square deal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was before another branch of this committee a few days ago, and I heard Mr. B. M. Baruch testify in reference to a contract he made with Mr. Ryan in regard to another matter. He stated that early in 1917, just before we entered the war, copper prices went up, and he went to New York and saw Mr. Ryan and one of the Guggenheims, and told them that the Government needed a large quantity of copper. Mr. Ryan said to him, "If the Government wants it for its own use, it can have my copper at any price you choose to fix," and they fixed the price at 16⅔ cents a pound, when copper was selling in the market at from 32 cents to 36 cents a pound. The Government got all of the copper it wanted at 16⅔ cents, and Mr. Ryan gave up millions he could have made. I have never met this gentleman, but this record and all I have heard of him satisfies me that he is a man of splendid ability, a patriotic citizen, a true American, who willingly gave his time, his means and his great ability whenever his country or humanity called on him during the great crisis of 1917 and 1918, and that no selfishness stained a single one of his efforts during that period of his splendid service to his Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The treatment of Mr. Ryan by the majority of the subcommittee and the unfair criticism of the majority report are a fair sample of the way the majority has dealt with most of the gentlemen criticised in this report and the whole subject of aircraft production, and will satisfy anyone who makes a study of the report and the evidence upon which it is based that the report is not fair or just, and can not be used as a basis for the formation of an opinion in connection with aircraft production. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, may I have consent to revise and extend my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, no wonder there is a state of unrest everywhere. Instead of devoting our time to matters of weight and great moment, we are dealing with things that do not help and that cause the extravagant use of money. This is getting to be very much of an investigating Congress. I heard recently that a Republican Congressman said he was on a committee to investigate the expenses of a committee appointed to investigate the expenses of an investigating committee. And this is almost where we are at the present time. Suppose you hire a man to work on your farm and he devotes his time to investigating the surroundings. He wants to know why you used cypress shingles instead of pine, metal, or slate. He wants to know why you grew oak trees for shade instead of cedar. He wants to know why you faced your house to the north instead of to the east or in some other direction, and why your house is white instead of some other color. Would not you get tired and want less investigation and more work? Do you not think the American people are the same way? They want less investigation and more genuine service. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Men who do the least are the greatest investigators and the greatest faultfinders.

The man who does things does not investigate the other fellow's work so much. He is too busy doing things. He lets the fellow who does nothing but investigate do the investigating and criticizing. Noah built the ark while his neighbors were investigating and criticizing. George Washington led our forefathers to victory and achieved our independence while others investigated and criticized. Jesus Christ established on earth the doctrine of "Peace on earth and good will toward men," preached the doctrines which began the Christian era, went about doing good, and pointed out anew the pathway which leads from earth to heaven while others were criticizing and investigating. Some do, others investigate.

The Republicans have decided to investigate rather than do something of a constructive nature. They hope to succeed by faultfinding instead of fault mending. They are using up their breath smelling around where others have been at work, instead of using their energy to do real work themselves. The original camouflage of the human race is the criticism of others. The jeweler with real diamonds does not criticize the other fellow's goods. His diamonds sell without his finding fault with his neighbor's goods. The man with real character does not find it necessary to criticize other men in order to show up his own qualifications. His light will shine without his blowing out the candles of his neighbors. Imagine Edison criticizing other inventors in order to make his inventions show up. Such course is unthinkable. The man who does nothing criticizes the fellow who succeeds, for two reasons: First, to try to minimize the envied success, and, second, to endeavor to get the attention of the public away from his own failure. The Republican Party by investigating, criticizing, and backbiting admits, first, it has done nothing worthy of the public gaze; second, that it as a party is jealous of the Democratic success and wants to minimize the labors of the Democratic Party; and, third, that the Republican Party would throw the monkey wrench of discontent into the machinery of the wonderful accomplishments of the Democratic administration rather than help oil and perfect the machinery and rather than help build more machinery to keep this great country properly going. Will the Republicans find mistakes and errors? Of course they will. They would be a pretty set of fools if, with all the help and money they call for, they could not by mature effort find fault with what others did under the heat and pressure of war. The Democratic administration in the conduct of the Great War put the lives of our boys ahead of money, ahead of dollars and cents, and won the war.

If by haste a few million dollars were apparently wasted and the life of only one mother's boy was saved as a result, the money was gloriously spent. The millions which were spent were worth nothing, the lives which were saved are worth everything. The administration could not quibble over a few dollars, or even over a few million dollars, while the boys were being killed. We put the lives and victory ahead of dollars. Money became nothing and mere trash as compared with the lives of our boys and the victory for which they were dying and which they were winning.

It may be that if the Republicans had been in they would have been more careful and investigated everything more fully, made more recommendations and been more cautious and prudent in the matter of expenditure of money, even if several more thousand boys had been left dead on Flanders fields. Honestly they would not have been more careful. The Republicans love the soldier boys the same as the Democrats do. Then why all this effort to minimize what has been done? It is simply cheap, trashy politics. This kind of politics is like the fellow's potatoes which were few in a hill, far between, and scrappy. It is an admission by the Republican Party of inefficiency and of the lack of ability to do something worthy of praise. It indicates the weakness of the Republican Party to cope with the present situation and shows a shameful effort to get the mind of the country called away from their own lack of genuine, needful initiative. It is admitted that the administration in the excitement of war spent money to the limit. The thing had to be done. It was done. We won the war. Victory is ours, and no one will say that the victory is not worth the price. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has an hour and 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from California is through?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I yield an hour and 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield the balance of his time to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LEA of California. I believe it is understood that the other side should conclude. How much time has it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has 10 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Illinois has 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can not reserve his time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then, I understand, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin has 1 hour and 20 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the gentleman from Illinois has 1 hour and 20 minutes, which he yields to the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman from Wisconsin has an hour and 20 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish I had two hours, a good share of which I could use in responding to the remarks that have just been made. Before saying anything further, I desire to answer two or three gentlemen who have made mistakes or misstatements, which, I am sure, they would not care to have remain permanently in the RECORD in that form, before I address myself to the subject before us. I allude, first, to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who yesterday on the floor made this statement, which is untrue, and I am sure he would not stand for it, because he is a capable man and a man that has the respect of the House. He says:

> The Committee on Expenditures was organized. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] was appointed as a member of it and was made the chairman of the subcommittee on aviation. One of his first demands, under a threat to resign if it was not granted, was that he be permitted to employ a lawyer to review the findings and decisions of Mr. Justice Hughes, formerly of the Supreme Court of the United States. That consent was given.

There is not a shadow of truth in that statement.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I can not yield, my time is so limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman mean to say he did not come into the meeting of the full committee on request——

Mr. FREAR. I will not yield any further. I will not argue. I say that the statement is untrue. No; I will not argue any further.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman to order and demand that his words be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands that the words of the gentleman from Wisconsin be taken down. The Official Reporter will write out the words, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

I will not yield any further. I will not argue. I say the statement is untrue. No; I will not argue any further.

Mr. GARRETT. The words previous to that are the ones of which I complain, although this contains substantially the same statement. Now, if I may be indulged for a moment, I want to say this: I have never yet become involved in even a verbal controversy on the floor of this House. I have no desire to interfere with the gentleman proceeding to make his argument here, but I do not propose to stand for the statement that what I have said is untrue. If he wants to state his construction of the matter, well and good. I know exactly what happened——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand that the words be taken down?

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin make a statement?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly. I expected to. It will absolve the gentleman from intentional blame, I feel sure.

Mr. GARRETT. I will withhold the demand for a moment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can not withhold the demand for a moment. He must either withdraw it or insist upon it.

Mr. GARRETT. What is it the gentleman wants to say?

Mr. FREAR. I say that I never threatened to resign on the ground of employment of an attorney for our committee or on any ground that had the remotest relation to it, and I gave the gentleman credit in advance for not intentionally making a misstatement.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly; but not out of my time.

Mr. GARRETT. Did not the gentleman, in the full committee, in the early days of our hearings along in June, in the first week of the hearings, state to the full committee that he desired permission to employ an attorney?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARRETT. An attorney for his committee?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly; recommended and at the suggestion of Judge Hughes.

Mr. GARRETT. And stated that it was for the purpose of digesting and going over the report of Mr. Hughes?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; that is right.

Mr. GARRETT. And no objection came from the minority members.

Mr. FREAR. That is true. There is no disagreement between us on that.

Mr. GARRETT. But when some of the majority members of the committee raised some question about it the gentleman indicated his resignation.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no; that is not correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw the demand that the words be taken down?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. All this colloquy is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his demand that the words of the gentleman from Wisconsin be taken down?

Mr. GARRETT. If this statement of the gentleman is to go into the speech, I will withdraw the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized to proceed.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say briefly what the facts are. No one, to my knowledge, ever objected to the employment of an attorney by our committee. At the suggestion of Mr. Justice Hughes we employed an attorney for the purpose of not repeating the Hughes testimony of seventeen thousand and odd typewritten pages. We have taken 3,800 printed pages of evidence in our own hearings and the attorney who was employed took less than 200 pages. The offering of my resignation prior to any investigation was entirely on personal grounds, and I so stated. The statement made yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee puts it on an entirely different ground. That is all there is to it; but the danger of reading into one's actions a misstatement of reasons shows how the gentleman from Tennessee committed the error.

Mr. Chairman, there are a number of matters I would like to respond to here briefly and I do not know, because of limited time, how far I can get before I go into my own statement which I wish to make.

Mr. FESS. Make your own statement first.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Ohio suggests that I make my own remarks first. I will do that, but I desire first to say a word about the report of the minority. I would be perfectly willing as an attorney to go before any jury and not refer to the majority report, but to take the minority views with its admissions and general confessions or avoidance as substantiating practically every charge made by the majority.

THREE OF DISQUE'S WITNESSES TAKE 667 PRINTED PAGES.

Let me state briefly that of the testimony of over 4,000 printed pages Mr. Disque, the official in charge of spruce, consumes about 330 pages of testimony. Col. Gorrell, who was a young man 26 years of age during the war, a clerk at headquarters, covers 210 pages. Stearns, Disque's chief of staff, covers 127 pages, or 667 pages for three witnesses who were called by Disque. Much of the testimony that has been quoted in the minority views comes from these men, and especially from Col. Gorrell, a very young officer here in Washington. He indulges largely in conclusions, just as the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] to-day has given many conclusions as to evidence not found and not contained in the hearings, nothing that other committee members ever heard before; statements based apparently upon what he claims to believe, on evidence not presented before the committee.

But you have no method of determining its value. I can not meet this unusual method of discussion, because much of it is not based on evidence. I would refer to it in detail if I had the opportunity.

On page 2 of the minority views the United States is placed as the fourteenth country among the nations of the world in amount contributed toward the development of aviation, at the beginning of the war, and we are found below Brazil. The European war had been on for two years and a half before we went into it. Why did not Mr. Baker or some other administration officer try and get us out of the disgraceful position which we then occupied? I know that every appropriation asked for has been given by Congress. To make a virtue of our helplessness and unpreparedness is the height of folly. It is a part of the administration responsibility that can not be evaded or avoided. While the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] was talking, a few minutes ago, apologizing for our miserable showing, a note was sent me from the gallery, which I will read:

FLOOD states we entered war helpless. Every successful engine and plane of Europe was placed at our disposal. Within 30 days we had at least 25 aero-dynamo engineers in America. Neither Europe's experience, her engines, or planes, nor our own men, our own expert airplane designers, were used by the auto manufacturers in charge.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman state who wrote the note?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Borglum, a man who started the entire airplane investigation at the outset and performed a great public service. He reminds me in the note of a fact shown conclusively by the Hughes and Thomas hearings. We had every facility to make fighting planes, but we failed because of official incompetence.

INCOMPETENCE AND INEXPERIENCE CONCEDED BY ALL.

Let me read a statement from page 6 of the minority views:

Inexperience and the excusable incompetence and inexperience, and that fault distributed among those in authority as well as designers, manufacturers, and mechanics, must be held responsible for a large part of the disappointing results of engine and plane production.

That answer I commend to the gentleman from Virginia. Incompetence, notorious incompetence.

Of course, that was the fault. That is what this investigation committee charges, not only inexperience and incompetence but inexcusable inexperience, and incompetence that is unforgivable.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has tried to excuse defects in machines through Kindley, a young aviator in the Army, who testified before our committee, and is the only gentleman who appeared before us that said a reasonably kind word about the DH–4 or the French Nieuport. Here is what the minority views say on that point:

One competent flier expressed a preference for the Nieuport.

When I examined the record, in surprise I found it was Capt. Kindley, who wisely did not needlessly invite the wrath of his superiors, and yet endeavored to make a fair, frank statement to the committee.

He was a brave fellow and did some fighting in Europe. He was killed a few days ago in a machine while flying in Texas.

But, Capt. Kindley in the hearings said he preferred the Spad for fighting over the Nieuport, and he said he never rode in any battles in a Nieuport or DH–4. He fought all his battles in an English "Camel" fighter. The DH–4 was an observation plane and not a battle plane, and Rickenbacker, Meissner, and every aviator witness who had used both the Spad and Nieuport machines declared the Nieuports we bought from France were discarded by the French for the Spad.

Many of our aviators who rode the death traps furnished by our officials are not alive to-day because they were not given proper treatment and proper fighting machines to fly, but all who did appear told the same tale of neglect.

Mr. Chairman, we have been regaled here with the statement that there were 11,000 machines manufactured in America. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] included 2,000 never-used training machines with the fighting machines and 4,000 utterly unsafe observation planes, and it was impossible to differentiate between them from his statement. I will endeavor to show you what a tragedy our program for fighting machines turned out to be. He says the program did not include fighting machines. Then why did we waste scores of millions of dollars in trying to build one that could be of service, and why did we utterly fail?

WHY SEEK TO PREVENT THE REPORT BY OUR COMMITTEE?

It was startling to me yesterday when we were called upon to vote on the resolution permitting us to make our report to the House. You gentlemen of the House were responsible for the resolution appointing this committee—you voted unanimously that we ascertain the facts and give the country our findings. Our committee was appointed to make the investigation at your direction. We did so, and then you gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle yesterday voted unanimously against permitting us to tell you what we found. The report was to be smothered and the American people were not to be allowed to know what we discovered in six months of an investigation that the House unanimously had directed us to make. [Applause.] The Democratic Members voted solidly against permitting us to report. What answer can you offer to the people for such a spectacle? We have conducted this investigation without partisanship, and I feel sure not one line of testimony in thousands of printed pages will be found to suggest political bias or prejudice, so far as the majority members of the committee are concerned, and yet the Democratic minority of over 100 Members yesterday voted solidly not to permit us to make our report to the country on the floor of the House. Why should you refuse to let the country know how our people were deceived and misled during the war by the complete failure of the Government's aircraft program?

Mr. Chairman, it is an accepted axiom that war means waste, and neither Congress nor the country cares to be reminded of ordinary waste of money or of lives lost in war. Where enormous public funds have been frittered away and needless lives sacrificed because of stupid and stubborn incompetence and worse; where we utterly failed in the war to do our share in aircraft production and suffered needless humiliation in the eyes of the world, the truth should be known.

INVESTIGATION WAS UNANIMOUSLY ORDERED BY THE HOUSE.

In order to know the truth all Democrats and Republicans in Congress unanimously passed a resolution directing an investigation of our aircraft failure and of other war expenditures. It was a thankless task and, speaking for myself, only undertaken after a vigorous protest. When finally accepted as a public duty we determined that no whitewash should result. Friends of powerful men and large interests have suggested the easiest way, but our report gives what we believe to be an unprejudiced statement of facts. We have had no friends to protect nor foes to punish, and we submit 4,000 pages of printed testimony on aircraft expenditures taken during six months of hearings, and I believe no suggestion of political or partisan bias on the part of my colleague, Mr. MAGEE, or myself will be found in the examinations. Reluctant and hostile witnesses were constantly encouraged in their attitude by unwarranted partisan criticisms against the committee, but we believe fair and just treatment was accorded by the committee to all interests concerned.

OVER $1,000,000,000 FOR AIRPLANES.

Congress unanimously appropriated $1,690,000,000 during the 19 months of war for aircraft purposes—an amount far greater than all the annual expenses of Government before the war and 70 per cent more than the entire national bonded debt prior to the war. All of this money was asked for by War Department estimates, and $1,051,000,000 was expended or pledged by contracts during the war for aircraft and airmen.

ONLY 213 PLANES FURNISHED OUT OF 25,000 PROMISED.

Early in the war Creel's publicity bureau promised that a great fleet of 25,000 American aeroplanes would decide the war before an effective American Army could be put in Euorpe. Deceptive statements were constantly given out about what we were doing and going to do, but at the signing of the armistice the American Government had not produced a single bombing or pursuit plane, nor had anything been sent to Europe excepting a handful of utterly unsafe and clumsy observation planes known as De Haviland 4's, while only 213 of these were in use on the battle line at the end of the war. The De Haviland 4's were known to all aviators—American, French, British, and German alike—as "flaming coffins," because of their unprotected gas tank and clumsy types that made it easy for the enemy to send them down in flames. Not one witness of all the aviators who used these machines at the front—over 200 in number who were still living—could be found to defend them or their use, and that was the only American machine sent to France in over a year and a half of war.

I here present a chart that can be read easily showing what we appropriated and what we got for the money in fighting planes:

LENGTH OF WAR.

European war begun August 14, 1914; 4 years 3 months.
American entry into war, April 6, 1917; 1 year 7 months.
Signing of armistice, November 11, 1918.

Aircraft appropriations and expenditures.

Total appropriations	$1,692,336,424
Revocations of excess, Feb. 5, 1919	487,000,000
Balance available for use	1,205,336,424
Expended or obligated to June 30, 1919	1,051,511,988

[P. 2856.]

Results at the French fighting front after 19 months of war.

American-built fighting planes	None.
American-built bombing planes	None.
American-built observation planes	213
Foreign planes bought or borrowed	527
Total planes	740

The chart needs no interpreter. It tells its own tale, which is almost unbelievable, but is undisputed by the record.

The French were using Sopwiths, Nieuports, and Spads for fighting machines when we entered the war, but were rapidly discarding the Sopwiths and Nieuports because of their weak construction and helplessness before the more powerful German Albatross and Fokker.

OBSOLETE PLANES BOUGHT FROM FRANCE.

During the war we were able to purchase a few training planes from the French, but only a few, according to Gen. Pershing, and also a few Sopwiths and Nieuports and a very few Spads, as they were discarded by the French. When the armistice was signed, out of 5,000 machines of all types procured from foreign governments, training, pursuit, and bombing, over 2,000 were Sopwiths and Nieuports. And at the end of the war 527 of these miscellaneous airplanes that were left, including obsolete or obsolescent, were the only fighting planes in use by our American aviators at the front, whereas 4,000 American aviators had reached France before November, 1918.

HUGHES AND THOMAS INVESTIGATIONS.

Extracts from Justice Hughes's investigation, made at the request of the President, will be found attached to our report. It gives a history of production and responsible aviation officials down to October, 1918, shortly before the end of the war. The Thomas subcommittee of the Senate Military Committee also made an investigation during the war, presenting a report in August, 1918. This committee made a brief summary of its findings, which will be found in our report. In that summary it declared that a large part of the $640,000,000 appropriation made in July, 1917, had been wasted and estimated $884,000,000 more was needed.

I insert here several findings of fact taken from the Thomas Senate report that place the brand of gross negligence and unparalleled official incompetence upon those charged with responsibility:

AN UNANSWERABLE INDICTMENT OF AMERICA'S AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION RECORD.

In view of the necessity for careful statement, plain speaking, and unquestioned authority during times of war, the Thomas Senate subcommittee report is astounding in character and certain in its conclusions. Quoting an extract from that report, we find stated (p. 3693):

On April 6, 1917, the United States entered the war. On June 8, 1917, public announcement was made that a great fleet of 25,000 aeroplanes was about to be created and would be decisive of the war months before an effective Army could be put in Europe.

July 24, 1917, Congress appropriated $640,000,000 to carry out the aircraft program. The fund has been either by actual expenditure or by commitments exhausted. A further appropriation of $884,304,758 has been found necessary.

In the opinion of the committee, a substantial part of the first appropriation was practically wasted, while an Army of three and one-half million men has been raised, the aircraft situation is as follows:

(a) Six hundred and one De Haviland 4's have been embarked for France up to August 1, 1918. Of these, 67 reached the front by July 1.

"(b) We have not a single American-made chasse or bombing plane upon the battle front.

(c) We have not a single American-made heavy bombing plane upon the battle front.

(d) We have not developed or put in quantity production a successful chasse or fighting plane."

Mr. Chairman, the Thomas report was caustic throughout, and says, among other things, that in August, 1918, we did not have a single American-made chasse or bombing plane or a single American-made heavy bombing plane upon the battle front, nor had we developed a successful chasse or fighting plane. This startling indictment of American waste and inefficiency was made by a committee of whom Senators THOMAS, REED, and HOKE SMITH, Democrats, constituted a majority, and they were not deterred, even during war, after nearly a year and a half of delay and disheartening experimenting, from giving to the country the facts as they were found.

We have endeavored to bring the Thomas and Hughes reports down to date, and we submit that no greater indictment of the administration's hopeless aircraft failure can be found than in those nonpartisan reports.

FATALITIES TO AMERICAN AVIATORS IN RECOGNIZED DEATH TRAPS.

Apart from 1,660 Standard J worthless planes and a few Bristols and wooden grasshoppers, none of which were of value, only a few training planes were manufactured in the whole United States in addition to the DH–4 Liberty observation machines. Four thousand of these observation planes were turned out, but they were all of a kind, and the fact that only 213 of these reached the French fighting front explains why the comparative death loss of American aviators per hour of flying was kept down to three times that of the Allies, as shown by the following table furnished by the War Department:

	Hours flown.	Fatalities.
British	255,842	245
Belgian	40,000	43
American Expeditionary Forces	35,747	106

I call your attention to the next chart, that conveys its own story. These can be read 100 feet away and will help you to visualize the colossal failure of our aviation program:

FLAMING COFFINS DH–4'S.

Only 213 flaming coffins reached fighting front.

"Many a gallant life was lost to American aviation during those early months of 1918, the responsibility for which must lie heavily upon some guilty conscience." (Rickenbacker, p. 196.)

Death traps in 1918 and 1919.

	Number aircraft.	Men killed.
October, 1919, transcontinental military airplane race:
Number unconverted De Haviland 4's	39	9
Converted De Haviland 4's and miscellaneous	34	1

In the last brief table furnished the committee by the Aircraft Division of the Army will be found a verification of every indictment lodged against these death traps by practically every aviator that came before the Hughes, Thomas, or our committee. This race occurred nearly a year after the war—from New York to San Francisco and back. It was held less than six months ago under the direction of the War Department, that must be held responsible for our aircraft failure during the war.

Nine deaths in 39 machines in time of peace is an awful record.

In other words, the deaths in unconverted De Haviland 4 observation planes were about eight times as large in times of peace as in an equal number of miscellaneous planes.

It is certain accidents were also proportionately greater, and in an enemy country in time of war this would have resulted in certain capture. In times of peace the fatalities were eight times as large as in other machines because of clumsy and dangerous construction and the added risk in battle by reason of the unprotected gas tanks.

Compared with other branches of service, the following risk in war by aviation officers is shown:

	Overseas.	Deaths in battle.	Deaths, accident.	Total deaths.
Flying officers	4,318	236	296	532
All other	96,484	2,001	139	2,140

From the foregoing it appears deaths by flying were five times as great as in the remaining branches of service and accidents about fifty times as great. This enormous fatality and accident risk is partly explained by the transcontinental race results in October, 1919, referred to.

EXPERT TESTIMONY ON OUR "FLAMING COFFINS."

I understand the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has criticized some statements quoted from Capt. Rickenbacker. Capt. Rickenbacker was before our committee. He said every statement quoted from his book was made on exact data taken at the time, and Secretary Baker recommended Rickenbacker's book to the committee.

I am sure the people will prefer to take the statements of those who were in battle and know whereof they speak rather than of those who question their testimony. Authorities will be quoted that should be accepted by everybody. Capt. Rickenbacker is an ace second to none. He had 26 victories to his credit. He was decorated. He made a wonderful showing, and his record helped average up this wonderful showing on the part of American aviators. Here is what he says, and he said that he made notations every day at the time of all his experiences:

From every side Fokkers were piquing upon the clumsy Liberty machines (DH—4) which, with their criminally constructed fuel tanks, offered so easy a target to the incendiary bullets of the enemy that their unfortunate pilots called this boasted achievement of our Aviation Department their "flaming coffins." During that one brief flight over Grand Pre I saw three of these crude machines go down in flames, an American pilot and an American gunner in each "flaming coffin" dying this frightful and needless death (p. 10 of report).

Do you doubt that what Capt. Rickenbacker said is true? We come now to another witness, a letter I read to the House several days ago, that was controverted a few minutes ago by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA]. This letter I received from a young aviator, a young Democrat from Lexington, Ky., an attorney at law. He says that he voted for Woodrow Wilson both times, and he states that to show that there was no partisanship, as there ought not to be with any of us on this question. Here is what he wrote, and this was only a few days ago:

LEXINGTON, KY., February 17, 1920.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I read with interest in the morning papers an account of your exposure of the mismanagement of our Air Service during the late war, and especially the portion of it regarding the "Great Liberty" plane, which was rightly named "flying coffins" by those on the front who were so unfortunate as to be assigned to fly them.

I volunteered at the beginning of the war, and after serving two months in an officers' training camp, threw away my chance for a commission in the Cavalry and enlisted as a cadet in the Air Service, and was trained by the Royal Air Force in Canada, later flying a few months in Texas, and then again in England, before going out to the front in France, where I was a pilot on a "flying coffin," doing day bombing until November 5, 1918, when I was transferred to be a pilot on the French Spad machine. Having used machines of Canada, England, France, and the "Liberty," think that I am qualified to give an opinion on the merits of the "coffin," as I was discharged last July.

The Twentieth Aero Squadron lost 11 aviators out of 12 on September 26, 1918, on the "coffins." I personally saw five go down in one fight in flames. If you would ask the opinion of the boys who are left out of the Eleventh, Twentieth, and One hundred and sixty-sixth, the only three "Liberty" bombing squadrons on the front, you will hear nothing but curses for the criminals that sent that machine with an unprotected gasoline tank to be used on the front. The aviators who were taken prisoners and returned from Germany after the war told me that the Huns ridiculed them for using such a death trap. No Frenchman, Englishman, or Hun would start over the lines with a DH–4 Liberty as we used. It was heralded over this country in the papers that the speed was 140 miles per hour, while we never secured one on the front that would go over 100, and if you placed bombs on it, as we did, 70 miles was the limit. You can figure your chance to fight a German machine making 140 miles and with a protected tank.

I have no grouch at anyone, but know that many of my friends were uselessly shot down in flames in France, and I have yet to find a friend of the "coffins" among the boys who used them and they are the only ones qualified to speak, not some general in Paris surrounded by the many pleasures of that gay city. I am a Democrat, worked for Wilson before his nomination in 1912, voted for him in 1916, went to Washington to see him inaugurated, March, 1917, and went A. W. O. L. in France December 14, 1918, to see his triumphant entry into Paris, but some of his appointees have sure played havoc with the Air Service and sacrificed many lives.

If you need the addresses of the real aviators who used the "coffins" on the front, will take pleasure in sending them to you, and I am sure that they all appreciate your stand in the matter, also the Hon. WALTER W. MAGEE. Do not care to have my name used as yet before I think it necessary.

Yours, very sincerely, ——— ———.

Do you doubt the truth of that letter received several days ago by a man who fought in these death traps?

How is that evidence met? The statement is specific and comes from an aviator who was flying in battle against the Germans. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] again finds fault, and says, "Oh, he did not sign his name and therefore is to be disbelieved." I anticipated that we would hear some such excuse. We have had that same experience all through this investigation, so I wired to the writer day before yesterday and asked him as a special favor to use his name. He replied, granting permission and signed the telegram "R. E. Lee Murphy," of Lexington, Ky. How do you gentlemen over here on the Democratic side like that name? How is that for a name for a good soldier? He was named after a good soldier during the Civil War, was he not? And then Murphy at the end of it! Murphy! For Heaven's sake, with that name is there any question about his fighting ability? [Laughter and applause.] I insert here his telegram:

LEXINGTON, KY., March 5, 1920.

JAMES A. FREAR, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Permission granted. If you favor Air Service and need detailed information regarding facts not in your report, will furnish them by letter or person.

R. E. LEE MURPHY.

SIXTEEN AVIATORS OUT OF SIXTEEN NEVER CAME BACK.

Capt. Sweeney, an American engineer, testified before our committee, describing 16 American aviators whom he saw make a flight on August 22, 1918, and never came back. All were killed or captured, according to Capt. Williams, the officer commanding; and he, Sweeney, describes the leave-taking, in which the flyers all bid good-bye, not "au revoir," because their defective planes—DH-4's, Sopwiths, and Nieuports—offered practically no chance of escape. Before they started, Capt. Williams, in charge of the aviation group, said to Capt. Sweeney:

Those American machines have no protection. As soon as a bullet hits the gasoline tank it is certain it will take fire immediately, and the men—the pilot and observer—have no chance to get away. He said the boys called those flaming coffins. * * * He said they would not come back; that when one of the machines was struck it was the finish. The French machines were old and not up to date. They were not as fast as the German machines, and they did not figure they had much chance in these machines either. I saw Capt. Williams about a month afterwards and asked if any of those 16 fellows came back. He said he had never heard of any of them. He said they had fallen inside the German lines and had been captured or killed.

Mr. Chairman, in seeking to answer this testimony of Capt. Sweeney, another brave officer at the front, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] for the first time in six months puts in a denial and reflects upon Sweeney's testimony, although not one word of doubt has ever been cast upon it before in any hearing. It is the method of trying to bolster up a weak defense and whitewash responsible officers frequently encountered in the past. Capt. Sweeney gave his evidence fairly, frankly, and he impressed us as a very able and fearless witness.

Murphy says any of the real aviators who used the "coffins" are of the same opinion as to the DH-4 death traps, and that he has yet to find a friend of the "coffins" among the boys who used them and they are the only ones qualified to speak. And yet the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] assails the credibility of practically every witness.

Capt. McKay, of the One hundred and sixty-fourth Infantry, who was liaison officer "to connect up with the airplane," testified before our committee that some of his companies lost half their men during the nine days of battle in the Argonne, from September 26 to October 4. On page 34 of our report, he says:

During the Argonne battle * * * the German airplanes would come and shoot us up * * * rake us on one side and then on the other with their machine guns. * * *

Mr. MAGEE. You did not have a fighting plane to protect you?

Capt. MCKAY. No; I never saw an American plane go after the Germans.

How is that answered? Six months afterwards, a few minutes ago for the first time we hear the statement from the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], "But I have learned from some man, never called, that McKay was mistaken," or words to that effect. The defense of a frightful nationl airplane tragedy is hard pressed when the only answer offered is that these witnesses are all untruthful. The whitewash attempt is overdone.

WHY WERE OUR TROOPS UNPROTECTED?

The pressing need of airplane protection by our troops was evidenced by the following letter written August 11, 1918, by a young soldier after the battle of Chateau-Thierry:

Your past experiences bring you unusually close to the service, and you can appreciate better than nine out of ten persons the soldiers' welfare. You can rest assured they are doing their part to the very last and best that is in them. I was never more proud of my country than I have been since I came up to this location. Even the French admit that their greatest efforts do not surpass those of the Americans in the present struggle. I have seen them going in and afterwards at the hospital. Their spirit is the most wonderful thing you ever saw in your life. They say the casualties in our division (the Thirty-second) are quite large, but their efforts and their driving capacity can not be surpassed. Just keep on lending them all the assistance possible, no one deserves it more. I wouldn't have missed this war for anything. I guess I have gone through all of the sensations possible for me to have.

If you will only send us more airplanes, and then more and more, it will hasten the finale. The men are coming through fine, but the airplanes have disappointed us. We depend upon these so much more than you can appreciate.

When this letter was read to him, Secretary Baker responded to our committee: "That is a very feeling and beautiful letter, and undoubtedly every word of it was so." I knew it was true, because it had been received during the war from my own son, then at the front.

The next question and answer explain tragic conditions then existing in France:

Mr. FREAR. And we did not during the whole period of the war get a fighting machine or bombing plane to the front?

Secretary BAKER. Not a fighting machine or a bombing machine of American manufacture.

DEFECTIVE NIEUPORTS AND SOPWITHS PURCHASED FOR AMERICAN AIRMEN.

The causes for heavy fatalities among American flyers and our troops in the trenches, due to defective planes and superiority of enemy planes, was not alone due to the 213 flying coffins, but also to the defective and obsolete planes bought from the French and given to our airmen. Rickenbacker says of these foreign-bought planes, page 9 of the report:

From the frequency of accidents to our Nieuport it may be wondered why we continued to use them. The answer is simple; we had no others we could use. The American air forces were in dire need of machines of all kinds. We were thankful to get any kind that would fly. The French had already discarded the Nieuport for the steadier, stronger Spad, and thus our Government was able to buy from the French a certain number of these out-of-date Nieuport machines for American pilots—or go without. Consequently our American pilots in France were compelled to venture out in Nieuports against more experienced pilots in more modern machines. None of us in France could understand what prevented our great country from furnishing machines equal to the best in the world.

Many a gallant life was lost to American aviation during those early months in 1918, the responsibility for which must lie heavily upon some guilty conscience.

Maj. Meissner and other American aviators testified to the same effect regarding these defective planes, and in one brief finding the Thomas Senate committee says:

An Army officer recently at the front testified that the American troops are using many antiquated machines purchased from the French that were discarded by them a year and a half ago. They are using the Sopwith * * *, which has been declared unsafe by the French and British, for observation work.

What answer can be made to this finding of a Senate committee? Who is responsible for this waste of life?

It is not the men alone who were killed by these defective machines which were furnished them, but it is those who ought to have been protected in the trenches and on the ground who missed that promised protection.

AGREEMENT AMONG AVIATORS AS TO THE "UTTERLY DANGEROUS" DH-4 PLANES.

Mr. Chairman, the testimony of men at the front, from Generals Mitchell, Kenly, and Foulois, experienced aviators, down to all the aviators before our committee and before the Thomas committee, including Maj. Muhlenberg, Col. Clark, Maj. LaGuardia, Maj. Meissner, Capt. Heisen, Capt. Eastman, Capt. Archibald, and last, but not least, Capt. Rickenbacker, all these men testified to the defective, dangerous, and clumsy type of machine that was turned out by us under the name of "Liberty DH-4," and practically all testified to the defective, obsolete planes bought from the French. They were short themselves.

The boasted achievement called a "Liberty" was ridiculed and condemned by the aviators of every country from England to Germany, and yet 213 of these observation planes, in which 50 defects were pointed out by Gen. Pershing, were the only American planes of any type furnished American aviators at the front by the War Department after over a year and a half of experimenting and an expenditure of over a billion dollars.

No further evidence of the dangerous and defective machines built, bought, or borrowed for the use of American aviators need be offered. It is important to show how a billion dollars was frittered away, but absolute neglect and utter disregard of our airmen and of those who depended upon them, resulting in many untold tragedies, calls for something more serious than legislative criticism. We give you the facts.

I now propose to show that the responsible officials knew of the dangerous and defective machines they were furnishing American aviators, and that they willfully continued to force these machines on our fliers, who had no choice, over in France. To my mind this is far more serious than any mere charge of incompetence. If true, it was willful waste of life.

DIRECTOR RYAN KNEW ABOUT THE "UTTERLY UNSAFE" PLANES HE WAS SENDING AMERICAN AVIATORS IN 1918.

During the summer of 1918 Director John D. Ryan and Secretary of War Baker were before the Thomas Senate subcommittee, and they were both grilled over the "flying coffins" they were sending to France, as shown by the following testimony taken from pages 11 and 12 of our report:

Senator REED. You know that the best and most experienced fliers, a number of them in this country, have testified before this committee that they regard the De Haviland machine as utterly unsafe, and that they would refuse to go up in it or send subordinates up in it?

Mr. RYAN. I understand that some have testified that they have refused to go up in it or let subordinates go up in it.

Senator REED. You propose to go on making the De Haviland 4 machines?

Mr. RYAN. Until we can put the De Haviland 9 in production.

Senator REED. Do you intend to do that regardless of any testimony that may be given by experienced fliers that the machine is utterly unsafe?

Mr. RYAN. I am not convinced that the burden of testimony of the fliers throughout the country is that the De Haviland 4 is an unsafe machine.

Think of the testimony of all those people given throughout 1918, and even down to the last transcontinental race, and yet Mr. Ryan said that "he was not convinced." On his own admission Director Ryan must be held responsible. He knew the facts. Senator REED forced him to know them.

The Senate committee way back in the summer of 1918 knew what death traps were being sent American aviators and a majority of this committee was composed of Democrats. The gentleman from California has wisely not questioned the declarations of the Senate committee which agreed with all the witnesses who have been quoted by our committee.

Again, Senator NEW was questioning Secretary Baker, and in like manner Senator NEW pictured the desperate plight of American aviators in the following question (p. 12 of report):

Senator NEW. It is a fact that every flyer that we have had before this committee as a witness, including several who have seen long service abroad, both with our own forces, the British forces, and the French forces, have testified that the De Haviland 4 machine, with the defects appearing in it as it has been produced at the Dayton-Wright factory, is highly dangerous and ought not under any circumstances be used; and at least one officer has testified that he would no longer send men up from his field in a machine of that type until after these defects had been remedied. In view of that condition, as it has been expressed and recorded by the men who are best qualified to pass upon the conditions and quality of that machine, I, at least, think it was a very great error of policy and judgment to have sent them forward before these mistakes were corrected, and I wanted to know whether or not you agreed with that view.

Secretary BAKER. The subcommittee, of course, has a great advantage over me in that I have not been permitted to see any of the testimony the committee has taken, so that I do not know anything about this concurrence of opinion to which you refer.

Senator NEW. I am telling you now what that opinion is.

Mr. Baker's answer was evasive like Director Ryan's but the Senate committee fixed knowledge upon both of them.

Disclosing the joint responsibility of Mr. Ryan and himself, Mr. Baker testified before our own committee, as follows (p. 12 of report):

Secretary BAKER. Mr. Ryan and I talked over the general question * * * and I approved that we should not suspend making any machine we were then making, but we should go on and make it and get ready to make others.

Secretary Baker and Mr. Ryan testified before the Senate committee that "they did not know," and here comes Secretary Baker testifying before our committee that they continued building these death traps, when back in the summer of 1918 the defects of this De Haviland 4 machine had been pointed out to them by the Senate committee, and such death traps ought never to have been used. Yet they kept manufacturing them, and notwithstanding this record made by a strong Senate committee, the Democratic national committee cries "politics," and then assails our committee because we refuse to whitewash responsible officials.

No fighting plane was ever produced by American factories for our soldiers. One billion dollars, but no fighting planes, that is the record.

With full knowledge of the defective machines they were furnishing American aviators, Director of Aircraft Ryan and Secretary Baker left orders to continue manufacturing the "flaming coffin" observation DH-4's, the only American planes ever sent to the French front, and soon after the Thomas hearings in August, 1918, these two officials left for Europe on a six weeks' trip. All the waste of money can be overlooked or forgotten, but Rickenbacker's statement is significant in view of the uncontradicted facts when he says:

Many a gallant life was lost to American aviation during those early months of 1918, the responsibility for which must lie heavily upon some guilty conscience.

His condemnation of the flaming coffins is in keeping with Murphy, the Lexington aviator, who says: "You will hear nothing but curses for the criminals that sent that machine with an unprotected gasoline tank to be used on the front."

These estimates of machines and of responsibility for absolute failure come from aviators who were in France and not from the committee. Men have been punished for trivial offenses by military courts-martial, but what about responsible officials who failed when failures meant the needless sacrifice of lives and jeopardized results in battle, and not alone a failure for our airmen, but failure of our Government officials to give aircraft protection to the men in the trenches.

No chapter in the entire record of the war will equal this one for neglect in which our helpless aviators in France were compelled to make useless and needless sacrifice of life because of refusal or failure of responsible officers in this country to provide proper fighting airplanes, and no American-made fighting planes ever were provided for American aviators.

THREE AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION DIRECTORS.

It was stated here a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] that great sacrifices were made by the gentlemen who controlled copper interests and that they had done much for the country during those trying days of the war; possibly they did, but here is what the country and the war did for them.

Messrs. Deeds, Potter, and Ryan in their order had charge of aircraft production during the war. Deeds centered governmental activities under large contracts aggregating $50,000,000 among his associates of his home city of Dayton, Ohio, until he was ousted about the first of 1918. It has been said in the argument that Gen. Ansell said Deeds did good work. Judge Hughes critically examined Deeds's record, and after a careful investigation recommended that he be court-martialed. I am willing to take Justice Hughes's judgment in preference to that of anyone else. Mr. Deeds did not lose money through the war. Mr. Potter, his successor, was and is president or director of a score of great companies and representative of the Guggenheim copper interests. The Utah Copper Co., of which Mr. Potter is a director, increased dividends from $4,827,885 in 1914 before the European War to $23,555,105 in 1917, or about 500 per cent, and doubled its depreciation charges in 1917. Mr. Potter's other companies were also money makers. Like Mr. Deeds, Mr. Potter did not lose money through the war.

John D. Ryan succeeded Potter in April, 1918, as director of aircraft and had charge of aircraft production to the end of the war. Like Mr. Potter, he is president or director of many large companies, including the Anaconda Copper Co., which alone in 1914 declared profits of $9,198,410, and in 1916, two years later, jumped profits nearly 600 per cent, to $51,779,517. Its gross sales thereafter reached over $150,000,000 annually to the end of the war, but a large sum apparently was marked off for depreciation, taken out of profits, thereby preventing the profits being taxed. In April, 1919, the War Department sold back to the United Metals Selling Co.—John D. Ryan, president—100,000,000 pounds of copper, that made many millions in profits and "stabilized" the copper business. Secretary Baker admitted in his testimony he approved this arrangement. Like Deeds and Potter, Mr. Ryan did not lose money through the war. So much for the enormous sacrifices of these men who knew nothing of aircraft, but were in charge.

Without commenting upon the many private activities or great profits of these men or of the enormous copper purchases and sales made by the War Department as set forth in the hearings, in which they were large beneficiaries, it is certain that men engaged in many gigantic private business affairs could not give their entire time or attention to aircraft production as public necessity demanded, even if they understood the aircraft business, which they did not.

The testimony also shows that Director Ryan was absent on two trips for two months or more during the summer of 1918, one to the coast and the other to Europe. As Ford testified, "No one seemed to be on the job."

The following record of the experience of men chosen by Secretary Baker to control aircraft production is offered in chart 3:

Aircraft production officials—Experience in aircraft production.

Officials:	Experience.
Deeds	None.
Disque	None.
Potter	None.
Ryan	None.

1918 airplane production.

January	744
February	725
March	934
April	728
May	598
June	448
July	666
August	489
September	450
October	560

Above figures exclude DH-4 observation "flaming coffins" but include 1,660 standard J machines and scores of Bristols which were discarded as death traps. The table also includes 300 useless "wooden penguins," and so forth. No fighting planes were ever produced with the billion dollars we spent.

The foregoing table should be studied carefully to discover how rapidly (?) aircraft production was stimulated by the billion dollars expenditure during 1918.

A proper program at the beginning of the war would have produced 30,000 fighting machines in the Curtiss factory alone, according to Vice President Keys, who said they could turn out 100 fighting planes a day.

DEEDS, POTTER, AND RYAN, ALL WITHOUT PRIOR KNOWLEDGE OF AIRCRAFT.

Neither Deeds, Potter, nor Ryan, who were appointed by Secretary of War Baker, had the first knowledge of aircraft business. This was disclosed before the Thomas committee during the summer of 1918, in the following examination, on page 21 of the report:

Senator REED. What was Mr. Potter's occupation or business before he came in?
Mr. RYAN. He was in the mining and metallurgical business and connected with the Guggenheims.
Senator REED. And never had anything to do with aircraft?
Mr. RYAN. I think not.

Again, referring to Kellogg, Wolff, Brown, Fletcher, and others under Ryan:

Senator REED. There was not a single one of these men who had had experience, so far as you know, in aircraft production?
Mr. RYAN. Not so far as I know.
Senator REED. They were men that you think had the final say in regard to contracts before you took charge?
Mr. RYAN. Subject, of course, to Gen. Squier, who was Chief of the Signal Corps. They were under him.

Leaving these men in charge of production during the critical months of 1918, Director Ryan took his trips to the coast and Europe, where he joined Secretary Baker.

Why did Secretary Baker appoint such men to a position of transcendent importance?

The statement on chart 3 shows the experience of the four men who were appointed by Secretary Baker to the most important positions in aircraft production. It is marked "none" and did not take long to acquire.

What wonder America failed miserably in her airplane program and that the 25,000 airplanes in France predicted in the spring of 1917 only reached 213 defective observation planes at the front by the end of the war in November, 1918.

CAPITALIZING INDEFENSIBLE OFFICIAL BLUNDERS.

With a monstrous presumption that has attended the entire record of aircraft failures, the War Department has issued publications stating that 11,754 American planes were built during the war, of which 3,329 were fighting planes. In order to make a showing for the enormous waste of a great part of the thousand million dollars spent for airplanes, the War Department counts as planes over 300 wooden grasshoppers, that were as useless as wooden guns; a number of "fighting Bristols," that were discarded after several aviators were killed at the first test; 1,660 standard J planes, that were so dangerous they were never used; and 4,000 "utterly unsafe" observation De Haviland 4's, or in all 6,000 planes, the only machines we ever built apart from a few training planes, representing about $75,000,000 of wasted money. Counting such machines as American airplanes is like counting counterfeit money as a bank asset, with this difference, that the bank is not chargeable with producing the counterfeit, whereas the aircraft officials were so responsible.

THIRTY THOUSAND FIGHTING PLANES COULD HAVE BEEN BUILT BY ONE FACTORY IN 1918.

No fighting machines were ever produced by our aircraft officials during the 19 months of war. That is pure fiction, intended to delude the American public into a belief that something was really accomplished in aircraft production. Apart from training planes, many of which were destroyed by accident, the record is a blank, although witness Keys, as stated, testified before our committee—page 15 of the report—that his company, with its 18,700 men, could have built 100 fighting planes a day in the single Curtiss plant if given the order, or 30,000 a year. When he was asked why he did not do this—"Did they allow you to help?"—he said, "No; that is the ghastly failure of the War Department program; they did not." He said, "The Navy did, but the Army would not allow us to help."

The full enormity of the War Department's failure becomes apparent where many other factories were also idle, waiting on Army experts, who only got 213 defective planes to the front.

The findings of the Thomas Senate subcommittee that no fighting plane of American manufacture had been produced up to August, 1918, held good until the signing of the armistice. We never produced anything of value except a few training planes.

EVERYTHING SACRIFICED FOR THE CLUMSY LIBERTY "FLAMING COFFINS."

Everything was sacrificed by Gen. Squier to the new motor that was to revolutionize aviation. Squier was finally removed. If he had been doing good work, as suggested by the apologists for the administration, then why did they not keep him? They relieved him after eight months had disclosed how miserably he had failed. He ought never to have been appointed.

A veil of secrecy and stupid trustfulness was dropped over experiments during the first year of the war while Squier consulted the stars and complacently dreamed of a Liberty motor that would some day do all things well. Secretary Baker agreed with Squier, according to his testimony; and Col. Deeds, who was the first to take charge of aircraft production, was more actively concerned in placing $50,000,000 in Government contracts among his Dayton business associates than in manufacturing recognized types of airplanes then in use.

The attempt to fit the new Liberty motor into an English Bristol was a tragic failure and a waste of a year's time during the war, with $6,000,000 thrown away. The $17,500,000 standard J failure followed, and then worst of all, the much touted observation DH-4 was put into quantity production. No Spads, no Capronis, nor other foreign fighting machines then in use in France were built or attempted. Our allies were producing dozens of successful types, while with us the mountain struggled and groaned and brought forth a mouse.

My colleague, Mr. MAGEE, whose valued aid has ever been rendered in this investigation, told you to-day there were 40 or 50 different fighting machines being manufactured by the various countries of Europe, and yet we could not build one fighting machine of any recognized type. Why? He read you the statement that our allies were sending over here a number of engineers in 1917 to help us manufacture, but Squier and Deeds were holding up everything for over a year waiting for these Liberty fighting machines that never materialized. That is the record we refuse to whitewash.

NO POSSIBLE EXCUSE FOR THE RECORD OF MISERABLE FAILURE.

Mr. Chairman, if we had been starting in a new, untried field, delay or even failure might have been forgiven, but with two and a half years of war experience of our allies to guide us and with the imperative necessity for quick action on proved types with future experiments as a side line no possible excuse can be offered for the miserable failure that resulted.

A revolting picture of favoritism was presented after Justice Hughes recommended Deeds for court-martial and at first recommended for trial by the judge advocate. Secretary Baker then directed the judge advocate to hear Deeds's attorney and two of Deeds's business associates. Thereupon, based on a new report, he refused to court-martial Deeds, who then came to Washington and was banqueted at the Army and Navy Club by Gen. Squier, whom Justice Hughes described as an incompetent. Deeds returned to Dayton, Squier was decorated with the distinguished service medal by Secretary Baker, and placed by him in command of the Signal Corps, which position Gen. Squier now holds. Study that record and then you will understand why America failed her allies and failed her own troops in aviation. Our aviators were the finest in the world, but they had to fight with broken reeds.

SQUANDERING HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS WITHOUT PRODUCING PLANES.

It is profitless to follow up the riot of waste in money that occurred on every hand during the expenditure of the $1,050,000,000 in about 15 months of money appropriated for aircraft; $75,000,000 was spent for three useless and dangerous types of planes put forth by the master blunderers of the war, as has been described. Seven hundred different contracts were made in amounts running from $100,000 to $30,000,000 to pay for everything imaginable. The Air Service was such in name only, and the heated article through publicity agencies was its chief asset during 19 months of war.

Castor beans were bought and planted and castor-oil factories were built at great expense on a scale that promised to meet all the future needs of man and planes, but, like all other aircraft programs, the seed did not germinate, and several years of careful husbandry would have been required, according to prospects, to produce enough castor oil for aircraft bearings.

Dope factories costing millions of dollars were planned to provide dope for airplane wings, but the only successful dope program seemingly was that put forth by the publicity bureau to show airplane accomplishments that never materialized.

INEXCUSABLE BUNGLING OF AIRPLANE SPRUCE PRODUCTION.

Mr. Chairman, spruce for airplanes has been discussed by my colleague, and I will refer only to one or two angles of the $50,000,000, in round numbers, spent for fir and spruce—two-thirds of which was wasted, as I propose to show by expert authority.

With no recognized head or organization during 1917, the Allies continued their plans of 1915 and 1916 in dealing directly with lumber brokers and millmen of the coast. Lack of proper organization, traced directly to the city of Washington, prevented a proper enlistment of producing lumber agencies in airplane lumber.

LUMBER IN 1917 FOR 100,000 AIRPLANES AND MORE.

In 1917 over 5,000,000,000 feet of commercial fir lumber was produced in Oregon and Washington. Before the country ever heard of Capt. Disque this was enough to build a separate airplane for every American, French, and British soldier on the battle front at the time of signing the armistice. As it requires 10 men or more in fields, shops, and back of the line for each plane used, it is apparent that if lumber interests on the coast had been coordinated it would not have taken 2 per cent of the 1916 or 1917 fir production to furnish 100,000 airplanes or double the number produced by England, France, and Italy combined during the last year of the war. (See p. 15 of the report.) Nearly half of the airplane lumber produced on the coast and shipped in 1918 was fir. Keep in mind that orders to retard airplane lumber production were received from Europe in September, 1918.

SPRUCE PRODUCED IN 1917 SUFFICIENT FOR 30,000 PLANES.

Spruce was preferred early in the war for certain types of planes, and spruce commercial lumber production on the coast in 1916 and 1917 was over 300,000,000 feet each year. Allowing 90 per cent for waste, this would have furnished enough spruce to have built upward of 30,000 planes yearly, and with 1 per cent of the fir cut would have drugged the market with airplane stock reaching double in amount all the Allies could use, if properly handled.

In October, 1917, Disque, a former captain in the Regular Army and then warden of the Michigan Penitentiary, was selected by Secretary of War Baker to handle the spruce situation. Mr. Deeds, Mr. Potter, and Mr. Ryan had been selected by the Secretary in 1917 and 1918 to direct aircraft production, and as these officials were utterly without knowledge of the business it was appropriate that Capt. Disque, promoted to a colonel, who could not tell a spruce tree from a hemlock, according to testimony, should have been placed in charge of spruce production. Scores of able lumbering men among the 400 mills and numerous logging camps were available if called upon, but Secretary Baker passed them up.

WHAT REAL LUMBERMEN ACCOMPLISHED IN 1918.

Pendleton, a lumberman of Everett, Wash., was given charge of airplane production in Canada, and overcoming apparently insurmountable obstacles was making a wonderful record when the armistice was signed. He rafted logs 175 miles to Canadian mills and was sawing 8,000,000 feet monthly at the end of the war of finished airplane lumber, or enough to build from 5,000 to 8,000 machines monthly—more than all the allied planes combined at that rate.

Pendleton's compensation was a gold sovereign and the grateful thanks of the Dominion of Canada for his remarkable work. Kelly, a lumberman, went from Portland, Oreg., and took charge of all American lumbering in France. Starting without a single mill, within a year Col. Kelly built 81 mills and was sawing 50,000,000 feet of lumber a month, part of which was airplane material. That is what lumbermen could and did do.

DISQUE'S UNBUSINESSLIKE METHODS.

Col. Disque was no lumberman. He spent months trying to learn the rudiments of the business, and during this period he put in force an eight-hour day in all the mills and camps on the coast during the most perilous months of war. He closed mills that refused to comply with his orders as to hours or terms of pay, whether sawing airplane or commercial lumber. When Col. Breece came out to Portland, after Disque had been on the job for several months, he testified that Disque was not getting "5 per cent airplane" lumber from his logs. This was another of the many do-little, know-little appointments of the Secretary of War that caused certain failure in our air program.

Col. Disque before leaving Washington had insisted that he be given free rein with all the money, soldiers, and power he called for, and he had his wish. He quickly surrounded himself with 30,000 soldiers, sent by the Secretary of War, practically all of whom knew nothing more of spruce than did their commanding officer. He drew plans of campaign against the spruce and fir that would have done credit to the War College in the largeness of his scheme. Practically every large timber tract on the coast was to be entered by four cost-plus contractors, who were to divide the territory and build 13 new railways, with an aggregate mileage of 139 miles, and then move on the spruce enemy. Remembering that fifty times more fir and spruce were cut by private operators in 1916 and also in 1917 than could possibly be used for airplanes, the largeness of Col. Disque's military occupation campaign in 1918 will be immediately apparent, even if the reason was not apparent at the time.

COST-PLUS CONTRACTORS WHO NEVER PRODUCED.

When the armistice was signed Disque had not received a stick of airplane lumber from his four big cost-plus operators, who had been preparing for from six months to nearly a year to get logs and lumber. All they got was $19,015,368 of public funds, which Disque paid them during their getting-ready operations and after the war.

Early in 1918 a faint attempt had been made by Col. Disque to get airplane lumber by riving logs. This was an enormously expensive operation and was soon abandoned. During this brief period these cost-plus contractors are credited with getting out only 7.4 per cent of the total year's production, which reached 143,000,000 feet. All the remaining 92.6 per cent was furnished by private operators, and during the last six months of war the cost-plus contractors were getting ready to make a flank attack on the spruce enemy, but had not moved a single foot of lumber.

PRIVATE OPERATORS PRODUCED A SURPLUS IN SEPTEMBER, 1918.

Mr. Chairman, the most remarkable part of this comedy of errors or monumental tragedy, whichever way it may be viewed, lies in the fact that in September, 1918, about six weeks before the end of the war, Disque received word from Great Britain that Europe was getting all the airplane lumber it could use, and thereafter he began to slow down production long before any of his much-heralded cost-plus operators were ready to operate.

In other words, private operators of Canada and the coast were furnishing more lumber than could be used, and if coordinated and encouraged they certainly could have more than doubled the output without affecting their commercial operations. As Disque's 30,000 soldiers were employed in building roads and mills for his four cost-plus operators and not for private operators, the absurdity of sending an army to the coast is beyond successful contradiction.

COST-PLUS TIMBER CONTRACTORS FROM BROADWAY.

Remarkable facts were developed in the selection of Disque's four cost-plus contractors. While hundreds of lumbermen and loggers of high financial and business standing were on the coast, Col. Disque chose three cost-plus contractors who, like himself, knew absolutely nothing about the business. The Grant Smith-Porter Bros. Co. had formerly carried on some railway building operations, the Warren Spruce Co. was an offshoot of the Warren Construction Co. of Maine that laid paving, and the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Co. was organized by Broadway railroad contractors who were without the slightest knowledge of logging and lumbering. Nothing in the abortive efforts of these three contractors to get spruce during six months ran counter to their admitted ignorance of the business. They were given contracts aggregating nearly $70,000,000 for airplane-lumber production and the four received about $19,000,000 while trying to learn the business. The fourth cost-plus contractor, Polson, was a logger, but he did not produce because he was handicapped by a military overseer who delayed progress over four months and so prevented him, according to his own testimony, from getting 30,000,000 feet of logs to market (p. 46 of report).

PRIVATE OPERATORS PRODUCED 7,000,000,000 FEET WITHOUT SOLDIERS IN 1917.

Mr. Chairman, from the testimony before the committee it appeared that some sporadic labor disagreements had occurred in lumbering operations early in 1917, but not materially different from those in many other lines of work throughout the country. No authenticated cases of sabotage or lawlessness were presented, and the Secretary of War was advised by western operators in 1917 that four companies of soldiers, to use in emergency, would meet every need that might arise. These he refused to send, according to Maj. Sligh's testimony. In fact, the lumbering business on the coast, with its 100,000 employees, was working without a single soldier in 1916 and 1917, and the normal output of over 7,000,000,000 feet of lumber each year shows the extent of operations. Throughout 1918 Pendleton, in Canada, under similar conditions, with 10 per cent of Disque's facilities, made his wonderful showing in producing airplane lumber without a single soldier.

FARMING OUT AMERICAN SOLDIERS FOR FUTURE PRIVATE OPERATIONS.

Col. Disque asked for troops and still more troops from the time he went to the coast, in October, 1917, to the end of the war, at which time he had secured about 30,000 officers and men at Portland, Oreg. These consisted of lawyers, doctors, teachers, farmers, and men of all trades, brought from all points from New York to Texas. The soldiers were distributed by Disque among his four cost-plus contractors to build railways ostensibly for logging operations and perform other work. The report shows he farmed out 5,251 men and 173 officers to the Polson operations around Grays Harbor; 4,736 men and 140 officers were given to the Broadway firm known as the Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Co.; and something over 3,000 each to the two remaining cost-plus contractors, while 4,000 others were put to work at the cut-up plant near Portland, and the remainder were scattered through Oregon and Washington. They were not doing any military duties, but were shoveling on the railways, laying ties and track, and a few days before the armistice a small number were trying to do a little logging. These soldiers, sent by Mr. Baker and Mr. Ryan, were used on permanent work that promised to be of value to private interests after the war, but the war ended too early for their calculations.

OFFICERS FELL OVER EACH OTHER AT HEADQUARTERS.

Col. Disque, according to his own statement on page 41 of the report, had 500 officers and enlisted men around his eight-story Portland headquarters building, where he reigned like a monarch of old. Colonels, majors, captains and enlisted men fell over themselves and over each other at the headquarters. Col. Kelly was doing wonders in lumbering in France, where no private operators existed, and had about as many soldiers as Disque, yet was working in the mountains of France, with from 20 to 24 officers and men at his division headquarters, while Disque had twenty times as many surrounding his person at his Portland headquarters. Col. Kelly worked his soldiers from daybreak to nightfall, sometimes in deep snow and often near the battle line, where his men were killed in the French woods while working at $30 per month. Disque's men were farmed out to cost-plus contractors and elsewhere in Washington and Oregon, working only eight union hours daily. They were eventually paid by the Government from $3.50 to $8 per day—a civilian's wage—and, in addition to free insurance against accident in the woods, also paid for by the Government, they were given many advantages not possessed by soldiers in real army service while used on permanent railways and mills needed by private operators after the war and paid for by the Government.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE MEDALS FOR SWIVEL-CHAIR RECRUITS.

In the rôle of a benevolent despot, Disque surrounded himself with twelve hundred officers, including Majors Hitchcock, Moreley, Linehan, all from Cleveland, Ohio, the home of Secretary Baker; Eaman from Michigan, and many other majors. None of this remarkable cabinet or staff above named knew anything about lumbering, but none of Aircraft Director Ryan's subordinates knew anything about aircraft, according to the Thomas Senate hearings, so the director had no advantage over the colonel in absence of knowledge.

To make up for these shortcomings Col. Disque secured, through Director Ryan, a brigadier generalship, and then he recommended a score of his "staff" for distinguished service medals. Eaman, who had been in the service six weeks and whose most distinguished service consisted in helping to make Disque warden of the Michigan penitentiary, was given a major's appointment and recommended for the medal—rather rapid work for six weeks' service in the eight-story Portland headquarters.

Gen. Disque, like Squier, received a distinguished service medal from Secretary Baker, but time did not permit the 20 recommendations for similar medals to reach fruition before the war ended. Our committee refuses to whitewash that record.

PEONAGE AMONG AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. Chairman, I am charged by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] with saying out in Portland and Seattle that these soldiers working on the railways were in a state of peonage. I did say it, and I repeat it. The soldiers were sent to aid these cost-plus operators and operators who intended to use the railways and mills after the war. Not one cost-plus contractor produced anything for the war. The word "peonage" came from the soldiers themselves who testified before us, many of whom protested against the situation in which they were placed, and it was un-American and indefensible to use the soldiers during war or at any time for private purposes. How can you gentlemen satisfy the taking of those soldiers by Disque and giving them eight hours a day and confining them to that safe place, paying them $3.50 to $8 a day, when our men over in France were serving for a dollar a day and working day and night, without limit to hours when on the front? No law, civil or military, warranted farming these soldiers out like peons to the cost-plus operators for their 13 railroads and different mills. The act of Disque in farming out to private contractors men clothed in American uniforms was not only unlawful but in direct violation of the Constitution, which contains a prohibition against involuntary servitude. For this act the Secretary of War, Director Ryan, and Col. Disque were all responsible. It is conceivable that Disque's previous training in the Michigan penal institution might recommend him to his superior officers for such a job, but the responsibility primarily belongs to those who sent him to the coast and then sent 30,000 American soldiers to work for four cost-plus contractors who expected to monopolize the airplane lumber trade during the war but failed to get ready after six months' preparation. Their apparent purpose to monopolize the business after the war also failed when they became frightened out according to witness Senator Donlan, of Missoula, Mont., because of threatened investigations.

No man can successfully justify the farming out of these soldiers. Again we refuse to whitewash responsible officers.

FIGHTING EIGHT HOURS PER DAY (?).

If it was right to prevent over eight hours' work and compel the Government to pay cost-plus operators civilian wages for soldiers in Oregon and Washington in time of war and critical national danger, then it must have been right for Secretary Baker to have restricted to eight hours per day the fighting of American troops in the trenches.

If it was wrong for our soldiers to exceed union hours or receive less than union-scale wages while in the mills and forests of Oregon, then it was wrong in the mills and forests of France.

If the policy agreed to by Messrs. Baker and Disque in the western zone of safety during time of war and of unprecedented sacrifice had been the policy of Col. Kelly in his lumbering in France, or Gen. Pershing in his military operations overseas, then America and her soldiers probably would be fighting in Flanders to-day.

Disque had no authority of law to limit the daily service of soldiers to eight hours or to give them civilian wages at Government expense, or to farm them out to cost-plus contractors, in order to build commercial railways, sawmills, and on other work intended for private lumbering operations after the war, but he did all these things, with the approval of Secretary of War Baker and Director Ryan.

SQUANDERING PUBLIC MONEY ON PUBLICITY BUREAUS AND TOURING CARS.

Disque maintained an advertising or publicity bureau that cost $47,255. Organized ostensibly to promote patriotism, a laudable purpose, the 81 officers and enlisted men under him so employed were continually boasting through different publications of Col. Disque's wonderful achievements. One of the most remarkable literary productions ever inflicted on the American public is called "The History of the Spruce Production Division," which was presumably paid for out of the spruce company treasury, and is a prolonged eulogy of Col. Disque. Among the interesting data there collected is an item of over $1,000,000 worth of motor vehicles, including 110 touring cars, used for Col. Disque's distinguished medal division on the coast.

A RIOT OF WASTE FOR "LOGGING ROADS."

I insert the list of logging roads built by Disque's cost-plus contractors that were never used. They cost nearly $10,000,000, and, taking the actual main-line construction, which reached 115 miles instead of 139, the average cost of five of these roads, with a main-line mileage of 78 miles, not counting sidings, was $107,000 a mile. This amount is nearly double the cost of transcontinental lines and from five to seven times what properly built roads should have cost. The roads were frequently located and constructed for purposes far removed from airplane-lumber production, and I have caused to be prepared three large maps, in order that the House may better understand the reckless waste of money that was found on every side.

SPRUCE COST GREAT BRITAIN $802 PER THOUSAND FEET.

Mr. Chairman, in the fall of 1918 the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy joined with our own in a pooling corporation, wherein the losses were to be divided and spruce allotted as follows:

	Per cent.
Great Britain	31
United States	34
France	24
Italy	10

After the war had ended Great Britain tried to write off her obligations, and in order to do so Col. Disque had the property on hand appraised by his own officers, with the result that the 13 railways that cost nearly ten million were given a salvage value of $750,000, or of 7½ per cent. On this basis Great Britain's settlement was $14,000,000, which reached a cost on the airplane lumber per thousand feet received of spruce, $802.20; fir, $287.20; and cedar, $895.

What would the cost have been if a capable lumberman had been given charge of the spruce job, like Pendleton of Canada, with direct deals with operators and power to coordinate existing logging and lumbering facilities, which are ten times greater than those of Canada?

OVER $33,000,000 WASTED ON SPRUCE.

The committee's expert accountant made careful estimates, basing proper expenditures on the regular highest contract price paid private operators during 1918, and he testified on a 10 per cent salvage of existing spruce production properties the loss is $35,796,324 and on a 20 per cent salvage value it will reach $33,447,837, or a waste of two-thirds of the total expenditures. It is a sanguine man who will figure that a salvage value of more than 20 per cent will be realized, so that the costly experiment of placing Disque, a Regular Army officer, in control of a business of which he knew nothing, involving extravagant railways built for future private commercial operators and sawmills costing millions of dollars built for the same purpose, is an enormous expense that never produced a stick of airplane lumber and would have been avoided had the Secretary of War placed the work in the hands of a business expert.

It is incomprehensible why the Secretary of War constantly selected men without knowledge or experience to handle war production that especially called for experience and speed. Waste, blundering, and inefficiency was inevitable, and it is notoriously evident every interest ready to fatten off of public expenditures was on hand.

BUILDING LOGGING ROADS AT $140,000 PER MILE.

In the division of time my colleague on the committee, Mr. MAGEE, has comprehensively discussed the Carey spruce contract and railway and the connection of Aircraft Director Ryan with such operations. It is beyond the limits of any ordinary speech to effectively cover more than one phase of the manifold activities and expenditures of the Airplane Lumber Division, which is only one operation of the Aircraft Division. In our report we have made brief reference to 3 of the 13 logging roads, which unquestionably were built for commercial purposes after the war. These included the Otter Rock summer resort, ocean beach, road, No. 11, that cost, not counting sidetracks, $140,000 per mile; the Blodgett $2,000,000 road, No. 12, that also has an unsavory reputation, and is useful only to the Southern Pacific; and a third, $4,000,000 Carey logging road, No. 1, in Clallam Peninsula, that is tacked onto the Milwaukee Railway.

I call your attention to another chart that contains a lesson that requires no explanation, and illustrates where the money went that was supposed to produce airplane lumber:

Three transcontinental roads.

	Cost per mile.
Northern Pacific	$56,000
Great Northern	56,000
Milwaukee (unelectrified)	50,728

Three Disque logging roads.

	Cost per mile.
Siems-Carey road	$110,000
Yaquina Bay road	140,000
Alsea Bay road	89,000

Projected Clallam County roads.

	Cost.
Clallam Bay, 15 miles, $15,000 to $25,000 (estimated)	$375,000
Siems-Carey, 36 miles, as built (actual)	4,000,000

It is a remarkable fact that the three transcontinental roads in Montana, required by law to be assessed at full value, also have valuable equipment, consisting of locomotives and rolling stock, estimated generally at 25 per cent to 40 per cent of total value, and they also possess expensive terminals and telegraph and telephone lines. The logging roads which we traveled over have no equipment—only a borrowed hand car—and no terminals excepting the wooden post at the end of the line. These railways show how willfully public money was squandered.

Road No. 11 is 10.8 miles completed length of main line and covering side tracks. It cost $1,553,665, or about $140,000 per mile, based on main-track mileage. The timber in the Siletz district reaches from 10,000,000,000 to 20,000,000,000 feet, according to the testimony of Welch, Hall, Wade, Storey, and Ball. Six witnesses testified that a road 15 to 20 miles long extending north from Toledo located on the Yaquina River would reach 550,000,000 feet of spruce and an unlimited amount of fir. These witnesses were loggers, mill men, or reputable cruisers who were familiar with the region. Several witnesses, including engineers who had made surveys, testified an extension of such road north from Toledo could be made on less than a 1½ per cent grade and at a cost of from $15,000 to $20,000 per mile, according to the average price paid in such construction.

IMPROPERLY LOCATED ROAD COST APPROXIMATELY $140,000 PER MILE.

Mr. Storey offered to contract to build all the roads required for $15,000 per mile. Instead of building north from Toledo, directly into this large timber tract, a road was built by Col. Disque starting from Yaquina Bay, the western terminal of the Southern Pacific Railway, and then extending west to Newport on the seacoast, thence north along the coast by Agate Beach, on the west side of a ridge of bluffs reaching several hundred feet in height, and touching two or three small watering places along the shore. The road along the coast made a haul of about 24 miles, including rafting 12 miles. Mr. Storey, a lumberman of many years' experience, testified: "The locator of the road was either grossly incompetent, had an ax to grind, or was intoxicated" (p. 1823). Witness Hall testified Maj. Hitchcock told him, "The people of Newport would wire the President if they did not get a road up to Otter Rock" (p. 1730).

Sensational testimony by Capt. Millar, January 7, 1919 (p. 2378), was presented to Maj. Ray to the effect that he was offered $11,000 or $12,000 if he would locate the road through Newport on the coast. It is significant that Capt. Millar located it north from Toledo over the direct route to the timber. He was promptly removed after his report was submitted, and the road was finally built around by Newport and other summer resorts, at a cost of about $140,000 per mile, not counting sidetrack mileage.

A $2,000,000 23-MILE LOGGING ROAD.

A second Government logging railway, of even more significance, was built from Yaquina Bay to a comparatively small timber tract, 23 miles south along the coast, known as the "Blodgett" tract. This road (No. 12) cost $2,086,160 for 23½ miles, or an average cost per mile of main line of $89,000, not including the sidings. This road includes one bridge over Alsea Bay, over a mile long, which some day may become a valuable adjunct to the Southern Pacific System, but is of little value for any other purpose.

The methods pursued by military officers of the Spruce Production Corporation were disclosed in this case. A singular misconception of official authority during the war caused these officers to refer to themselves and to their acts as "the Government" and "acts of the Government." This situation is strikingly illustrated in their transactions with John W. Blodgett, of Grand Rapids, Mich., a man of high character and large business dealings, who owned the timber in question.

Mr. Blodgett's timber tract, 23 miles south of Yaquina Bay, contained 250,000,000 feet of spruce and some other timber—in all about 670,000,000 feet (p. 1894), or only a small fraction of spruce and fir compared with the Siletz tract. At Col. Disque's request Mr. Blodgett traveled to Portland, Oreg., to see him. Col. Disque there insisted that Mr. Blodgett must dispose of his spruce timber for $1.50 per thousand. Mr. Blodgett refused to consider the proposition because of existing destructive "selective" methods of logging, the fire risk, and low price.

Mr. Blodgett finally sold his timber after many threats were made to commandeer by Disque. He received $635,000 from the Government.

The road had not been completed when the armistice was signed, while the Blodgett deal was not closed until December 2, 1918, or nearly one month after the signing of the armistice. This timber tract, bought by Col. Disque, was to give value to a worthless $2,000,000 railroad, and it is significant that this railroad has not yet been sold by the Government, although given by the Spruce Production Corporation officials a salvage value of less than 8 per cent. This road also was blocked by slides when examined by your committee in September, 1919.

Charges were made of attempted official graft, based on trying to force Mr. Blodgett to sell for $450,000. No testimony to that end was presented to the committee.

The Government is out $2,000,000 on this railroad and has also paid $635,000 for the Blodgett timber tract.

A LIFELONG SALVAGE JOB.

None of the extravagantly built logging roads or mills have been sold by the Government after over a year's time, and they have little value, as was predicted when the committee was on the coast. Col. Stearns, a strutting young Army officer without previous business experience, was Disque's "chief of staff," and has been in charge with a force of men at Portland for over a year. He told the committee he would not sell until he got "reproduction value" on the railroads, which indicates his judgment and long expectancy of life on the job. The Portland (Oreg.) Spruce Co.'s operations since the war have long since ceased to be of any value to the Government and should be closed out.

FAT LUMBER CONTRACTS GIVEN TO BROADWAY NOVICES.

Early in April, 1918, a company of New York City railroad contractors, including Siems and Carey, hastily organized in New York, and, without any previous experience in logging or lumbering or any ownership of timber or acquaintance with the territory or business, left New York City for Clallam Peninsula, Wash., picking up Senator Donlan, of Missoula, Mont., on the way. They went to the Clallam Peninsula, and on their first visit drove around part of two days, then went to Portland, saw Disque, made a contract April 12, 1918, to furnish 300,000,000 feet of spruce flitches, and returned to Washington, D. C. Disque had refused to give any western lumbermen any contract to log this timber. Disque quickly followed them, and after a month's delay, during which John D. Ryan had succeeded his friend and associate, Potter, as aircraft director, a new contract was drawn in Washington, at Mr. Ryan's request, by A. L. Kelley, the present president of the Anaconda Copper Co., of which Director Ryan was then president. This contract reduced the amount of timber to 250,000,000 feet, gave an optional cost-plus contract of 7 per cent, with an unlimited maximum profit, and a provision that Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh could have option of purchase after the war, in which they were to name one of three appraisers, who, with a "Government" representative, was to name the third.

BROADWAY LUMBER GREENHORNS GET $30,000,000 IN CONTRACTS.

This contract, valued at $23,000,000, was dated May 18 and approved May 24 by Director Ryan, who, however, refused to participate in negotiations regarding a railway to haul out the spruce because of his connection with the Milwaukee road. As my colleague well says, the contracts were interdependent. Assistant Secretary of War Stettinius made the railway contract with Carey to connect with the Milwaukee road, and after a sudden unexplained switch by Disque of the logging road's location, operations were begun by soldiers sent to Disque by Secretary Baker, and Director Ryan, who went out to Carey's operations, looked them over and then returned by way of Portland to the East, leaving for Europe in company with Secretary Baker a few days later. They returned from Europe about the middle of October, shortly before the end of the war.

It was uncontradicted in testimony that Carey expected to permanently log and lumber after the war in the Clallam tract, and it was contended his railroad cost $4,000,000, or ten times what a properly located, properly constructed road ought to have cost from Clallam Bay to reach the same spruce tract. Carey built 2 mills in a region that had 400 available mills, at a cost of $2,350,000, all paid for by the Government.

The Siems-Carey Canal Co., an offshoot of the cost-plus contractor company, was controlled through 51 per cent of its stock and an even division of profits by the American International Corporation, of which Aircraft Director Ryan was a director. Mr. Ryan had previously aided Carey in his Chinese operations. The Carey logging road tapped 79,000 acres of land containing 2,000,000,000 feet of timber belonging to the Milwaukee company, of which Director Ryan was also a director and a member of the executive committee of five.

Many interesting connecting links of evidence are found in the report that it is unnecessary to here repeat. The committee finding that large financial interests were directly interested in continuing the lumbering business after the war and that the Carey railroad, mills, and other operations at Government expense were to be amortized, are all set forth. The war stopped unexpectedly, threatened investigations frightened off a $15,000,000 company proposed by Senator Donlan, of Missoula, Mont., and the scheme fell through, with the Government holding the useless property. It still owns that property.

After the war Col. Disque returned to New York and secured a job, through Director Ryan, as president of the Amsinck Importing & Exporting Co. at a salary of $30,000 a year on a job of which he knew "absolutely nothing."

The Amsinck Co.'s stock was all owned by the American International, previously referred to.

Disque's sudden switch of location of logging road after his return from Washington, his completion of the $4,000,000 road after the signing of the armistice on the advice of Mr. Erling and other Milwaukee officials, and other matters are all set forth in the report.

Maj. Sawyer, a Milwaukee official, was placed in charge of the Carey railroad operations, with Donovan, a Milwaukee engineer, looking after surveying and Donlan in charge of logging. At the end of the war Sawyer and Donovan returned to the Milwaukee road, while Donlan, who had previously returned to Montana, ran as a State senator at Mr. Ryan's request, according to the testimony of Witness Cain.

These matters have been presented by my colleague [Mr. MAGEE], and I have only suggested the remarkable situation we found on the coast for which money received from Liberty bonds was spent.

SOLDIERS COURT-MARTIALED FOR PETTY OFFENSES WHILE RESPONSIBLE OFFICERS GO SCOT FREE.

In our investigation we have endeavored to fix responsibility for the pitiful failure of the War Department to secure modern fighting planes either by manufacture or abroad. The direct responsibility of Deeds was disclosed by the hearings taken by Justice Hughes and by the report. His successful efforts to throw contracts to his friends and business associates in Dayton, although they knew nothing of the business, is one of the serious charges made in the Hughes report. Deeds was recommended for court-martial and it was due him to give him a fair trial, but the confidence of the public is shaken when hundreds of soldiers are tried and given extreme penalties for infraction of military rules, while a man charged with grave responsibilities involving many lives and public property is permitted to have the Secretary of War personally intercede and refuse to hold a court-martial recommended by presumably the ablest and most thorough investigator in the country—Justice Hughes.

Deeds's incompetence, due to selfish interest and inefficiency, is shown by the facts. No one stands sponsor for his appointment.

HUGHES FOUND SQUIER HOPELESSLY INEFFICIENT.

When Gen. Squier and his associates tried to whitewash Deeds by eulogizing him at the Army banquet, their action was characteristic of efforts to cover up that have been encountered by our committee and every other committee engaged in this investigation.

Gen. Squier was hopelessly inefficient, according to Justice Hughes, and it is pointed out by the distinguished jurist that no law can reach inefficiency.

Gen. Squier decided on a suicidal policy at the outset when he threw all his eggs into one basket, and the hopeless scramble of the eggs has left a stifling odor that will ever attach to the Government's airplane program during the war.

WHY AMERICAN AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION FELL DOWN.

Secretary Baker approved Squier's program and practically every other important move that occurred, including particularly the continued manufacture of the dangerous DH–4's. With Mr. Ryan he must accept full responsibility for that frightful blunder. The public may be anxious to forget, but however unwelcome the task, we have no alternative but to give the facts.

If anything else were offered, we would be deserving the severest condemnation by our colleagues without reference to personal or political considerations.

No further review of the facts is necessary. The Aircraft Service fell down because seemingly every responsible official from the Secretary of War down to the lowest official at headquarters refused to profit by the experience of other nations. Men were regularly appointed to high positions who had no knowledge of the business in hand and frequently had selfish interests to subserve. The entire record is one continuous story of wasted money and, more important, needlessly wasted lives.

We have urged an independent air service in our report, but to be of value it must be divorced from the Army with its bureaucratic methods. Congress has just reason to distrust those who have no knowledge of the business. We dealt with novices during the war; the American people now demand that any Government aircraft program be placed in the hands of competent officials, and that will only be done by a carefully organized department or bureau that can coordinate all aircraft production activities of the Government.

I have tried briefly to cover the results of our investigation. We have endeavored the best we could to make this investigation fairly, to make it without personal prejudice, without political prejudice. In all of the 4,000 pages of testimony I have repeatedly asked anyone to find a single page or word that suggests political or personal prejudice.

We endeavored throughout the six months' investigation to represent the House on both sides of the aisle, you gentlemen over here on the Democratic side, who gave us our commission, just as well as those on the Republican side. It was an undesired task and a thankless task that we undertook. Other gentlemen refused it, but finally we undertook the work as a matter of public duty, and 4,000 pages of testimony and the report is the record we present to you. If the record shows inordinate greed and selfish ambition, as it does, with incompetence from the top to the bottom, it is not offered because we individually want to injure anyone who failed to measure up to the high trust imposed, but because you commissioned us to make this investigation and report responsibility and show the great waste of money that has occurred; and beyond all, because during 1917 and 1918 failure meant a needless loss of men at the front who were fighting our battles in France.

Gentlemen, it is easier to say words of praise than words of condemnation. We all of us know that. And we would have been glad to put it in the other form if facts had warranted. But we have presented to you exactly the situation as it has confronted us, and through all the investigation we have tried to speak for the people, who wanted to know the truth and demanded the facts. We have tried to speak for the father who sent his boy over to France to fight, or, like my colleague and friend, FLORIAN LAMPERT, from Wisconsin, who sent his five boys to the war, some of whom did not come back. We have spoken for the hundreds of thousands of brave, patient women, who gave the best they had in the world, their best gifts, their boys; and for those who scraped up their last dollar and contributed it to the war in order to aid our country in her hour of peril. We have spoken for the American Congress—you who commissioned us unanimously to carry on this work, and you who unanimously gave $1,000,000,000 for aircraft in order to protect our boys in France. We speak for the boys who were in the trenches and shoulder to shoulder made their brave fight through the long days and nights in the trenches or over the top, in the shambles of the Argonne, or at Chateau-Thierry, or on the Marne, for our soldiers who never received that promised aircraft protection.

We speak for our boys who went up in the defective air machines. When they asked for bread we gave them a stone; when they asked for fighting machines we sent them "flaming coffins," and in the words of Rickenbacker, America's greatest ace, who appeared before our committee, may this record be seared deep into the conscience of those here who failed them and whose failure meant the needless loss of lives and an enormous amount of public money; wasted days and weeks and months of war; wasted millions and hundreds of millions of dollars and needlessly wasted lives. That is the record. From this picture of ghastly cost-plus contractors shown in this record, of war profiteers in a setting of arrogant, selfish, incompetent officers, let us turn for a moment to those boys in France who were fighting their way against tremendous odds and whose names will forever be linked with John Paul Jones and others of his day and deeds.

Ships that sail the sea and ships that sail the air, no matter how dangerous, no matter how clumsy in design, will never stop or impair the pluck and bravery of American sailors or soldiers. [Applause.] And our boys, called upon as they were to protect their colleagues, their comrades down in the trenches on the firing line, confronted with an enemy that had the finest fighting machines in the world and years of training—our flyers, in their defective machines and flaming coffins, sought out the enemy and fought them to a finish high above the clouds, and met every test. Gen. Pershing has said that American aviators were the equals of all; they had no superiors, and whether they returned to earth from their battles living or dead—and many of them to-day sleep beneath the lilies of France—they left a record that will never be surpassed for courage. Fighting for their flag and their country as they did, ever for victory, not for empty medals, they kept the faith, and they wiped out the blot of miserable incompetence disclosed in this country by their splendid deeds over there. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country are familiar with America's failure to produce aircraft; and failures will come again, and men who are incompetent will reign, presumably, in such places again. But this country may ever depend in the future, as in the past, upon the men who sail her ships, upon her men who sail the air, upon the great Army which makes up the rank and file, that comes from the heart and conscience of the people—the men who do the fighting. They will never fail. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

TABLES AND OTHER DATA—BRIEF EXTRACTS FROM COMMITTEE REPORT.

During our 19 months of war with Germany the American Congress appropriated for Signal Corps and aviation purposes as follows:

Appropriations	$1,692,336,424
Revocation of excess after the war (Feb. 5, 1919)	487,000,000
Balance available for use	1,205,336,424
Expended or obligated to June 30, 1919	1,051,511,988

The above statement is approximately correct. (Exhibit 9, p. 2856.)

During this period expenditures or commitments of over $1,000,000,000 produced the following machines used by American aviators on the French fighting front:

American-built pursuit or combat planes	None.
American-built bombing planes	None.
American-built observation planes (DH–4's)	213
Machines bought from our allies	527
Total planes on French front Nov. 11, 1918	740

(Pages 178, 179, 180, 185.)

Three thousand American aviators available for flying were in readiness on the front in August, 1918, but fighting planes were not to be had, according to testimony of Gen. Kenly, director of aviation, and an experienced aviator (p. 3494).

The number of American flyers on November 11, 1918, was 11,425, of whom 4,307 were in Europe and 7,118 in the United States (p. 284).

Testimony, October 31, 1919, before the Joint Military Committee, briefly gives the story of America's aviation record from a witness of acknowledged authority:

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you at any time have enough planes of any make of American or foreign to train that body [aviators then in France]?

"Gen. PERSHING. No; we were always short.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, we had a body of young men over there to be trained that could not be trained because we did not have the facilities to train them.

"Gen. PERSHING. Yes, sir. That is true (p. 1693, joint military hearings).

* * * * * * *

"Mr. JAMES. How many American fighting planes were there in France at the signing of the armistice?

"Gen. PERSHING. None. We had the De Haviland 4s.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. MILLER. I mean combat planes.

"Gen. PERSHING. No combat planes.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. KEARNS. Do you know the reason why there were no other American-made planes over there?

"Gen. PERSHING. I know very little of the construction program in America, nor the reason why we had no further planes. The only reason that I can give is that there were no planes ready to ship" (p. 1611, joint military hearings).

Bearing on the same question, Col. Patrick, Chief of Air Service, American Expeditionary Forces, in August, 1918, testified:

"Mr. FREAR. Two thousand seven hundred and twenty machines were necessary for 1,000,000 men (or 3,400 machines for American forces at the front)?

"Col. PATRICK. That would be it, approximately.

"Mr. FREAR. So we were woefully weak in our own Air Service, both in machines and men?

"Col. PATRICK. Yes, sir" (p. 187).

Our utter failure to produce fighting planes after 19 months of war is disclosed by one question:

"Mr. MAGEE. As far as the manufacture of pursuit planes or bombing planes in the United States is concerned, we are practically in the same position (August, 1919) we were in when we entered the World War?

"Col. PATRICK. Quite true" (p. 232).

That, in brief, is the story of America's aircraft production failure, occasioned by a record of stupidity and stubbornness that involved inexcusable waste of men and money and invited military disaster.

THE "UTTERLY UNSAFE" DE HAVILAND 4 PLANE, KNOWN AS THE "FLAMING COFFIN."

The only American plane that ever was used at the front—the De Haviland 4—was not a combat plane and was exceptionally dangerous to pilots and observers because of its defective construction. This fact and the general estimate of the De Haviland 4 is set forth in the testimony of Gen. Mitchell, in command of American aviation in France (pp. 2823, 2845), Maj. Muhlenberg (pp. 194–195), Col. Clark (p. 191), Rickenbacker (pp. 197–198), Eastman (p. 2391), Archibald, of the "Suicide Club" (pp. 1177–1179), Maj. LaGuardia (pp. 144–146), Maj. Meissner (p. 3629), Maj. Foulois (p. 368), Capt. Dissette (p. 2724), Capt. Heisen (pp. 2449–2452), and other reputable flyers or experts, including also many who appeared before the Thomas Senate committee (p. 34), and corroborated by Gen. Pershing's cablegram (p. 203).

American aviation statistics also disclose that in proportion to the number engaged five times as many American flyers were killed, compared with officers of all other branches of the service, and accidents to aviation officers, in round numbers, were fifty times as great. At the signing of the armistice 740 planes were in use on the front by American aviators and 236 officers had been killed in battle.

RECKLESS BLUNDERING OF RESPONSIBLE OFFICIALS.

Responsible American officials who refused to have manufactured recognized types of fighting machines then in service; who recklessly blundered with attempted quantity production of the worthless Bristol that could not carry the Liberty motor; who canceled the 3,000 Spad order given our factories in September, 1917; who ignored Gen. Foulois's request from France early in July, 1917, for 800 SE–5's, 800 Spads, 800 Sopwiths, and 8,000 specifically named fighting machines like planes then in use (pp. 360–670); who ignored the request of Gen. Mitchell and the French Government (pp. 2614–2617) for planes and aviators, have not suffered from "guilty conscience," but have sought to justify their record of mistakes and their appalling inefficiency with flimsy excuses.

* * * * * * *

The Hughes and Thomas investigations have placed the facts before the country for consideration of those who ungrudgingly raised a billion dollars that our troops might be protected with aircraft. Congress appropriated every dollar asked for, according to Gen. Squier (p. 3590), and with this record of failure Col. Deeds, Director of Aircraft, who had been removed and who had been recommended for court-martial by Justice Hughes, was banqueted in Washington by Chief Signal Officer Squier and other admirers for the kind of record he had made (p. 59).

* * * * * * *

We had the factories, men, and money, and might have turned out planes at a wholesale rate, when the uselessness of DH–4's in battle was demonstrated at the outset, but that was the only American machine ever produced for use at the front.

So much for the record of American aircraft production during 19 months of war. If the war had lasted two or three years longer and until responsible American officials decided to build Spads, Capronis, and real fighting machines, without constantly canceling orders, we might have shown results. Production of all Army planes, apart from DH–4's, in January, 1918, reached 744. Seven months afterwards, during strenuous war needs, American production reached 489 planes in August, 1918, or a loss of about 35 per cent compared with the month of January.

American airplane production, 1918.

October	554

The foregoing does not include the "quantity production" of DH–4's, but it does include all training planes, "sea sleds," and several hundred Penguins, or what are known as "wooden grasshoppers." It also includes 1,660 discarded worthless Standard J planes, described in the Thomas committee report, and scores of Bristols, also discarded. About 4,500 useless DH–4's were paid for by the United States at a cost of over $50,000,000.

The following statement gives comparative production of airplanes in Italy, France, England, and United States by months from January 1 to September 30, 1918, according to testimony of Gen. Menoher, Chief of Air Service:

Total production of airplanes in Italy, France, England, and United States, by months, from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30, 1918.

	Italy.	France.	England.	United States.[1]
January	305	1,484	2,347	729

September	374	2,238	2,726	1,207
Total	2,928	18,833	23,509	7,749

[1] The apparent discrepancy in American airplane production shown by the two tables is due to the DH–4's, which are included in the second table.

WASTED THREE TO FIVE MONTHS.

March 13, 1918, Gen. Pershing cabled Gen. Squier:

"Approximately 700 cadets in Europe awaiting flying training. These cadets have already wasted from three to five months for training, and it is estimated some of them will have to waste at least four months before their training can be commenced. * * * These conditions have produced profound discouragement among cadets (p. 375).

The whole country was becoming discouraged with Squier, Deeds, et al., and no relief ever in sight.

Vice President Keys, of the Curtiss Co., sets forth some of the contradictory orders received (pp. 3481–3483) while 789 changes were made under orders of the War Department in the attempted production of the discarded Bristol. The following testimony is illuminating regarding this one firm manufacturing planes:

"Mr. FREAR. How many men were you employing?

"Mr. KEYS. Eighteen thousand seven hundred.

"Mr. FREAR. What was your possible production capacity?

"Mr. KEYS. Our plant was designed for a maximum of 100 machines a day of any type small machines. * * * We contracted in September, 1918, to deliver 100 machines (fighting planes) a day" (pp. 3456–3457).

The Curtiss firm received an order for 3,000 fighting "Spads" on September 19, 1917. The order was canceled November 7, 1917, (P. 3755.) But this one factory could have produced 30,000 fighting planes a year, according to Keys, if given a free hand.

* * * * * * *

Gen. Squier, before the Senate Military Committee, January 30, 1918, explained his own state of mind at that early date when he said:

"I think we shipped no training planes to France at all. It is looming on the horizon that we may be producing more than we can get across and thereby be upsetting industry" (p. 24).

UPSETTING INDUSTRY.

Gen. Squier's statement before the Senate Military Committee was made shortly before Gen. Pershing cabled to him that 700 flying cadets had been from three to five months delayed in their training because of absence of planes.

While Gen. Pershing, Gen. Mitchell, Maj. Foulois, and others in France were frantically calling for planes with which to train and fight, Gen. Squier was calmly studying "the horizon" to discover whether we should "upset industry."

In his final report to the Secretary of War, Gen. Pershing says:

"In aviation we were entirely dependent upon our allies. * * * Without going into a complete discussion of aviation material, it will be sufficient to state that it was with great difficulty that we obtained equipment even for training."

* * * * * * *

A sufficient warning was given the department by Gen. Squier before the Senate Military Committee, January 30, 1918, when he said:

"We had to make a momentous decision back in April, 1917, when we decided to make the Liberty motor. * * * We had to throw the die. I think we did right. We had to decide whether we would go over to England and get those planes and engines and try to produce them or try to pool everything we had. That decision was taken boldly, and I think it was a very wise one" (p. 23).

Justice Hughes's report says of Gen. Squier (p. 3773):

"The duty of providing an adequate organization for aircraft production was left to the Signal Corps. It is quite clear that this undertaking was beyond the competency of the Chief Signal Officer."

Secretary of War Baker, while before our committee, said he approved Gen. Squier's course when he responded, "That was my judgment at the time and still is my judgment" (p. 23).

On Secretary Baker's shoulders must rest equal responsibility for failure to procure other engines and other planes when pooling all energies in the Liberty motor.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR DEEDS.

Col. Edward A. Deeds, of Dayton, Ohio, was placed in charge of the Equipment Division of Aviation under Gen. Squier in August, 1917, four months after our entry into the war.

Justice Hughes's report found that Deeds began his activities by centering aircraft operations at Dayton, Ohio; that he gave large contracts to his business associates—Kettering, Talbott, and others in that city, although they had no previous experience in such matters; that he located several aviation fields around Dayton in improper locations, and also located fields in Florida without authority or explanation; that Deeds was largely interested in corporations controlling the Delco ignition system used in the projected Liberty motor, whereas prior to its use on the Liberty the magneto system had been used on all airplane engines (p. 58).

The following is from the Hughes report (p. 57 of record):

"At the inception of the Government's aviation activity in connection with the war and within the sphere of Col. Deeds's important if not commanding influence, his former business associates were placed at once, through Government contracts, in a position where they had assurance of very large profits upon a comparatively small investment of their own money, and in addition were able to secure generous salaries which they charged against the Government as part of the cost of manufacture."

After reciting evidence in support of his conclusions, Justice Hughes finds:

"The evidence with respect to Col. Edward A. Deeds should be presented to the Secretary of War, to the end that Col. Deeds may be tried by court-martial under articles 95 and 96 of the Articles of War."

Justice Hughes's report is part 2 of this report and includes a detailed statement of testimony on which the finding was based.

In the Attorney General's report (p. 58 of the record) this finding appears:

"I acquiesce in the recommendations of Judge Hughes that the facts be submitted to the Secretary of War."

WHY WAS DEEDS'S COURT-MARTIAL PREVENTED?

For Deeds's alleged efforts to place large Government contracts with his business associates in Dayton, under questionable arrangements and for other reasons stated in his report, Justice Hughes recommended Deeds for court-martial (p. 57–58), and Attorney General Gregory joined in the report to the extent of declaring Col. Deeds's conduct inexcusable, reprehensible, and censurable, and recommended that all the facts be submitted to the Secretary of War (p. 58).

Based on the Hughes record, the Judge Advocate General's office on November 11, 1918, submitted its report approving the Hughes recommendations.

Subsequently Secretary of War Baker sent word to the Judge Advocate General's office requesting that other witnesses be heard on behalf of Deeds and that the report be reconsidered (p. 2653). This action, your committee is informed, was unprecedented. Col. Deeds's attorney and business associates, connected with these same Government contracts, were thereupon heard and a new report rendered exonerating Deeds (p. 2687). Secretary Baker's activity in protecting Deeds against Justice Hughes's finding is at once astonishing and significant. With a record that affected lives of men and charges of inordinate selfishness supported by specific facts, Deeds should have been placed on trial, to be convicted if guilty, to be vindicated if innocent. According to the testimony, Secretary Baker prevented such action.

RESPONSIBILITY OF ARMY OFFICIALS.

Responsibility for failure of our aircraft program rested upon those in authority, who have been named, and with equal force responsibility rested on Army officers in this country whose duty it was to provide an efficient aircraft force. Officers of the Army, who for many years have been subject to strict Army discipline, generally are loath to express themselves freely when their associates or superiors are concerned. Testimony from three responsible aviation officials, two of whom were in France charged with work on the front, is self-explanatory. All these officers were old experienced flyers of undoubted ability.

Gen. Foulois, early in 1917, shortly after the declaration of war, testified that he prepared for the General Staff and Congress an aircraft program covering 22,625 planes of specified types; 5,000 pilots, and 50,000 mechanics, at an estimated expense of $640,000,000, which amount Congress immediately appropriated (p. 367).

Gen. Foulois further testified:

"I was the responsible officer (in France) under the commander in chief. * * * Certain members of the General Staff were willing to be educated, but that was a very small minority. Other members were more or less disinterested and a certain proportion opposed to aviation.

"Mr. FREAR. What was that opposition grounded on?

"Gen. FOULOIS. * * * We could hear constant complaint about these young aviators running wild all the time, and too much rank and a great many features of that kind. * * * In my 21 years of service I have never seen it (jealousy in the Army) more prevalent than it is to-day. * * * Gen. Pershing, in my opinion, is the best friend aviation has in the Army. If it had not been for him, on a great many occasions we would not have had any Air Service."

Gen. Mitchell was commander of Air Service for a long period in France and was in the American Expeditionary Forces from the beginning to the end of the war and an experienced aviator.

Gen. Mitchell, with Ambassador Sharp, sent a cablegram April 16, 1918, to Gen. Squier strenuously urging 20,000 fighting planes for control of the air as described in program submitted (p. 2615). Again in May, 1918, a strong cablegram was sent Gen. Squier (p. 2618). These telegrams were never acknowledged. "They did not know in this country whether we knew anything about it. There were no dealings with the Signal Office. We could get absolutely nothing out of them" (p. 2638).

Gen. Kenly was Chief of Air Service from May, 1918, to practically the end of the war. He testified before the committee to the following effect: That appointments to the Air Service, as well as to the command of the Air Service, were not made because of any experience of the one appointed, and that such condition exists to-day. It may be due to favoritism or due to relationship, but it affects the morale of the department. Gen. Kenly advised that the Air Service should be put into the hands of a man conversant with the work and thoroughly in earnest about it (p. 3497).

THE DH–4 AND ITS 3,600 CHANGES.

Testimony before the committee showed that 789 changes were ordered in the construction of the Bristol, which was a reckless attempt to fit a foreign machine to the heavy Liberty motor, in which all our interests were pooled (p. 3450). After wasting $6,000,000, according to the Thomas Senate committee report, the Bristol was discarded early in 1918. According to the Hughes report, subject to salvage, $17,500,000 was wasted on 1,600 S. J.–1 training planes. About $50,000,000 was spent for 4,000 "utterly dangerous" DH–4's during the war. This accounts for nearly $75,000,000 largely wasted on three useless experimental planes.

No question exists but that the Liberty motor, when finally developed in 1918, could be used for bombing and observation planes, but for fighting planes it was entirely unfitted.

The claim that approximately 3,600 changes were made in the DH–4 observation plane during its development and that engine experimental development was equally difficult and involved, gives full significance to the danger of pooling all interests in experimenting on one air machine or on one engine for all air machines.

Apart from DH–4's, the record of airplane production, good, bad, and indifferent, none of which were fighting planes, reached a total of 6,342 during the 10 months of 1918, when the country supposed production was five times that number of fighting machines. What is more remarkable, the first five months' total of 3,729 dropped to 2,613, or about a 30 per cent loss, during the last five months of war (p. 518).

AMERICAN AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION—A CLOSE CORPORATION.

Many witnesses desired to testify regarding refusals to receive encouragement from the Army aircraft production officials for inventions whose practicability they declared had been demonstrated.

No stronger illustration of the stupidity of responsible Army airplane production officers need be offered than testimony of C. M. Keys, vice president of the Curtiss Co., that employed 18,000 men and produced $87,000,000 worth of aeronautical material (p. 3453):

"Mr. MAGEE. Was it your contention that if your engineers had been given a free hand that you could have designed and constructed efficient airplanes for service at the front?

"Mr. KEYS. There is no doubt in the world about that. We could have designed pursuit planes, bombing planes, observation planes—any types desired.

"Mr. MAGEE. But you were not permitted to do that?

"Mr. KEYS. We were not permitted to do it for the Army. * * * The Navy permitted us, and we furnished them. * * * I don't want to be critical in regard to the Army. It was a very ghastly mistake."

COL. DISQUE IN CHARGE OF SPRUCE PRODUCTION.

Col. Disque had been a Cavalry captain in the Regular Army, and resigned late in January, 1917, after 19 years of service, leaving the Philippines, where he was then stationed, and going to Michigan, where he took charge of the Michigan Penitentiary (p. 1358). He resigned his position as warden in September, 1917, when he was made a lieutenant colonel, and came to Washington in October of that year.

A remarkable situation occurred at Washington prior to Col. Disque taking charge at Portland, which Maj. Leadbetter, writing Mr. Howe, of the Aircraft Board, on January 4, 1917, described (pp. 1410–1411):

"Col. Disque was instructed to take up the matter from a labor standpoint with Mr. Samuel Gompers. This was done, and in a final interview the matter was settled in a way satisfactory to Mr. Gompers and his assistants. Mr. Gompers then requested that Col. Disque and the writer accompany him to the Secretary of War's office, where the Secretary of War approved of the general understanding and told Col. Disque to report to Gen. Bliss, Chief of Staff. * * * Col. Disque went West with this view of the situation. * * * Col. Disque met Gen. Squier in Portland * * * who told Disque that he would organize a complete department in Portland * * * and that he would increase his force to the maximum contemplated. Col. Disque came on East to get direct instructions from the Chief of Staff for this purpose. These he secured before Gen. Bliss left for Europe, and he * * * returned to the West. * * * The fact that the (Disque) was in close touch with Gompers, Mr. Morrison, Mr. Hamilton, and Mr. Gompers's other assistants and Assistant Secretary of Labor Post * * * goes to prove that no other man could have the confidence of these people that he has. The method by which these soldiers who are going into the woods should be paid must, of course, be carried out * * * (p. 1410).

* * * * * * *

DISQUE'S ARMY OF 30,000 MEN.

In May, 1918, the number under Col. Disque reached about 11,000 or 12,000. On November 1, 1918, the following disposition of troops existed, according to official records (p. 3689):

Cut-up plant, Vancouver, Wash	4,312
Disbursing quartermaster	9
Quartermaster	46
Portland headquarters	333
Medical Department	607
Logging and milling companies	17,571
Transportation unit	349
Loyal Legion	81
At cantonment	4,813
Total	28,121

This statement, the committee understands, does not include some 1,200 officers, many of whom were stationed at the eight-story palatial Portland headquarters. Col. Kelly, who was doing remarkable work for the American forces in France during this same period, had not to exceed 24 men at his camp headquarters (p. 2317).

An estimated average of 15,000 troops were paid approximately $50 extra pay per month from the Government for six months, or from May 1 to November 1, 1918. This is believed to be a conservative estimate, but reaches a total illegal payment by Government officials of $4,500,000.

WHAT THE UNITED STATES SHOULD HAVE PRODUCED.

The production of Washington and Oregon loggers and mills, working largely on one eight-hour shift, appears in Spruce Corporation, as follows (p. 3687):

Production of lumber by years in Oregon and Washington.

[Millions of feet.]

Year.	Fir.	Yellow pine.	Spruce.	Hemlock.	Total all species.
1916	5,118	587	317	337	6,715
1917	5,079	686	319	366	6,789
1918	5,478	658	492	344	7,313

Two shifts could have doubled the annual output of about 7,000,000,000 feet.

The fir and spruce production alone in Oregon and Washington during 1916 and 1917 reached about 5,500,000,000 feet annually, or more than thirty times the amount of airplane lumber produced in 1918 under Col. Disque. About 100,000 workmen, in the more than 400 mills upon the coast, were employed in turning out the logging and lumber cut of the Northwest.

This situation existed before Col. Disque ever made a single spruce contract in the West.

Col. Disque demonstrated his incapacity by his own record. The production of airplane lumber during eight months of 1918 up to the signing of the armistice, according to his own report, was as follows:

American spruce production, 1918, by months.	Feet.
April	13,583,165
May	11,864,722
June	9,000,134
July	13,776,251
August	18,861,506
September	16,682,639
October	22,145,823
November	7,427,928

(P. 1567.)

From this statement of airplane production it will be noted that the results under Col. Disque's management were nearly stationary for several months, but somewhat increased during October, 1918.

As early as September, 1918, more airplane lumber was being produced than could be used, and Col. Disque was so notified. Gen. Carmack, representing Great Britain, declared that during the last two months of the war more airplane lumber was received than the Allies could use (p. 1653). Col. Disque testified that before the end of the war he had been directed to reduce production 33 per cent from previous calculations (pp. 1394–1395). Undisputed testimony shows that private operators were producing all airplane lumber produced on the coast before Col. Disque received word to retard operations.

OFFICIAL PROTESTS AGAINST DISQUE'S ILLEGAL CONTRACTS.

On April 30, 1918, the Bureau of Aircraft Production had become so fearful of Disque's unbusinesslike method of procedure that Capt. L. C. Preston, of the Finance Division, wrote Maj. Brown, of the Finance Division of the Bureau of Aircraft Production, as follows:

"It has recently developed that Col. Disque has for some time past assumed that he has the right to approve all contracts, according to notice sent to this department by Capt. Crisp in letter of February 11, with the result that all contracts since the latter part of January have been made without being approved by this department or the Chief Signal Officer, the more important contracts which have not been approved being the three cost-plus contracts for rived spruce with Grant Smith-Porter Bros. Co., Warren Spruce Co., and the Airplane Spruce & Lumber Co., estimated at $13,000,000 each, and the contract with H. S. Mitchell for the management of the cut-up plant. By reason of the agreement entered into in these four contracts, it would seem that it would be desirable to exercise some supervision regarding the terms and legal form of the more important contracts entered into by the Spruce Production Division" (p. 2164).

Capt. Preston later became head of the War Credits Board, according to witness Gabrielson (p. 2164).

On July 15, 1918, or two and one-half months after the previous notice, Maj. A. C. Downey, head of the Contracts Department, Finance Division, Bureau of Aircraft Production, also wrote Maj. Brown as follows:

"The contract section has endeavored to assist and cooperate with the Spruce Production Division and had disapproved of certain contracts in order that their disbursing officer might be protected. They have apparently not relished this method of treatment and have recently taken the matter clear up with the view of forcing the contract section to approve the contracts which had previously been returned unapproved. In view of these facts it would occasion no grief to the contract section if Mr. Ryan should delegate to Col. Disque full authority to approve all contracts executed by the Spruce Production Division.

"However, until such time as this authority is granted the contract section will continue to adhere to its former policy, to wit, in that it will not approve of any contracts which are of such character as to indicate in any way that the interests of the Government of the United States are not being subserved" (p. 2164).

Special attention was thus called to three cost-plus contracts made by Disque to Grant Smith-Porter Bros., Warren Spruce Co., and the Airplane Spruce & Lumber Co., amounting to $13,000,000 each, or a total of $39,000,000. None of these contracts received the approval of the Chief Signal Officer, nor were they submitted to any official in the East authorized to act in such matters (p. 2165).

$19,000,000 WASTED ON FOUR COST-PLUS CONTRACTS.

Without authority, Col. Disque gave four cost-plus contracts for $39,000,000 to contractors named early in 1918, only one of whom had any experience in the logging or lumbering business. These contractors furnished about 11,000,000 feet of riving material prior to April, 1918 (p. 1509). No logs or lumber furnished by any of the cost-plus contractors reached the mills during the six or seven months thereafter, although they were continually making preparations.

In settlements made by Col. Disque after the war four cost-plus contractors received payments from the Government of over $19,000,000, as follows (p. 2857–2858):

Airplane Spruce & Lumber Co	$1,664,576
Grant Smith-Porter Bros	3,349,903
Warren Spruce Co	5,671,237
Siems-Carey-H. S. Kerbaugh Corporation	8,329,652
Total	19,015,368

DISTRIBUTION OF SOLDIERS.

Col. Disque's farming out of soldiers to the cost-plus contractors is shown by his own statement (p. 1690), which gives distribution as follows:

	Soldiers.	Officers.
Airplane Spruce & Lumber Co. (Grays Harbor)	5,251	173
Grant Smith-Porter Bros. (Clatsop district)	3,252	90
Warren Spruce Co. (Yaquina Bay)	3,298	72
Siems-Carey-H. S. Kerbaugh (Puget Sound)	4,736	140
Coos Bay	839	31
Portland headquarters (officers and men)	500	.....
Vancouver cut-up plant (officers and men)	4,000	.....
Total	21,876	506

(The remaining officers and men were at Vancouver Barracks.)

SOLDIERS WERE UNNECESSARY.

In view of Pendleton's Canadian production in eight months, under manifold difficulties, any competent lumberman, by organizing existing forces of the Northwest, without any soldiers could have produced, if necessary, a half billion feet of spruce and fir for airplanes in the year Col. Disque operated, and at a saving of $19,000,000 in cost-plus contracts. Coordination of 100,000 men who produced over 5,000,000,000 feet of fir and spruce lumber in 1917 would have met every requirement several months before orders were received by Col. Disque to retard production.

Col. Disque's operations, according to C. E. Dant, the largest operator on the coast, resulted in a loss in 1918 through improper sawing compared with individual operations in 1917. Lieut. Hollande, representing France, told Mr. Dant in the spring of 1918 that not more than 15 per cent of the lumber from the cut-up plant could then be used (p. 2261). Mr. Ayer, one of the largest lumbermen on the coast, said Lieut. Hollande, representing France, and Col. Beckett, representing Great Britain, told Disque what was wanted, but they did not get it (p. 2278).

Gen. Belin wrote or cabled on May 15, 1918, from Versailles, France, to Gen. Bliss, Chief of Staff, United States Army (p. 2263):

"Before the United States entered the war shipments of wood for airplanes took place by means of the ordinary mechanism of orders placed with private American firms, either by French manufacturers or, later, by the French Government. After the United States entered the war, control was taken over by the Government, which resulted in substituting a central organization, the only contractor abroad, for private American establishments. These measures did not succeed in entirely stopping shipments ordered of private American firms, although they decreased them to a considerable extent, and without replacing them, so far, by regular Government shipments.

"Whether this state of affairs is due to a slackening in American production, difficulties in railway transportation, and insufficient number of vessels chartered for the transportation of wood, measures taken by the United States to safeguard her own war supplies, or whether it is due to all these causes together, the fact remains that the first shipments of wood under the control of the American Government (arrivals distributed among the Allies from December, 1917), did not begin until early in March, 1918, and then only in a totally inadequate manner.

"Supplies of wood for the Air Service from September, 1917, until March, 1918, were thus entirely due to the remains of private importation. The gaps in the shipments during the last few months have seriously compromised the situation of aviation production and the situation of the Air Service is consequently such that the least thing may make a very serious matter of it."

SERIOUSLY COMPROMISING AVIATION PRODUCTION.

During six months, from November, 1917, to May, 1918, while Col. Disque was trying to learn the lumber business, he had "seriously compromised the situation of aviation production." In other words, he prevented private producers from dealing directly with the Allies, as in the past, and his 8-hour day, riving operations, closing of mills, and other orders and experiments, had greatly limited the production of aircraft lumber.

Estimated salvage of property that cost $23,000,000 at about $4,000,000, including railroads at less than 10 per cent of their cost, is an estimate filed nearly a year ago. The cost of the logging railroads was, as a matter of fact, practically $10,000,000 (p. 1593). With a large force of officers and civilians at Portland waiting to get "reproduction" figures, as proposed by Col. Stearns, now in charge, this Government property should be closed out on some basis without further delay.

CONCLUSIONS.

Briefly stated, the American Congress during the war appropriated over $1,000,000,000 that was expended for aircraft activities.

Apart from training planes, practically nothing but a handful of DH–4 "flaming coffins" was produced. The sorely pressed Allies were persuaded to sell us a few largely obsolescent planes, with which we equipped our aviators. In all lines of aircraft production we subordinated speed, immediate needs, and experience to be gained from other nations to "quantity production." Instead of inviting all agencies to aid, the War Department engineering "experts" jealously refused intelligent and experienced help. These experts during the war tried to develop an automobile engine and fit it into all types of aircraft. The result was an impossible program that for a year and a half awaited the experiments of military engineering experts. Battle or pursuit planes would not have reached quantity production in 1919, judging from past experience in 1917 and 1918, and with a scarcity of planes possessed by our Allies every gift or sale by them was at a tremendous military and national sacrifice. Inexperience, ignorance of the business, and inefficiency from beginning to end marked our aircraft production program during the war. Our strongest asset was the airplane production of our Allies, the splendid fighting spirit of American aviators, and the weakness of the enemy toward the end, for all of which our aircraft production program was in no way responsible.

Waste of the larger part of $1,000,000,000 will not be entirely lost if we have learned a lesson from the past.

Lack of public confidence in War Department aviation plans appears well grounded. America should keep abreast of modern aircraft thought, and invention must not be permitted to lag behind; but the great stumblingblock to-day lies in a knowledge by Congress, and to a large extent by the country, that the War Department has made a mess of America's aircraft program and has not developed any competent head to inspire public confidence.

A SEPARATE AIR SERVICE INDISPENSABLE.

Any investigation to be of permanent value should offer a solution for the problem of intelligent aircraft advancement.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, the striking failure of the War Department to rise to the aircraft emergency, either in peace or in war, has made necessary the creation of a separate bureau or department of aeronautics. Therein all governmental activities should be centered, with a capable, progressive official at the head.

Practically every witness examined on the subject of future American air service united in a plea for separate independent control. From generals to lieutenants, from private citizens, familiar with the subject, and from every experienced aviator appearing before our committee, including Gens. Mitchell, Kenly, and Foulois, military aircraft authoriities, and LaGuardia, Meissner, Kindley, and, last but not least, Rickenbacker—men who upheld American air laurels at the front—all unanimously urge a separate air service that will work and cooperate with the Army, Navy, Post Office, and Interior Departments in the development of aviation. We feel that real progress in aviation must depend in a material degree upon encouragement given to civil and commercial aviation.

Adequate appropriations, wisely expended, are necessary to put America to the front where she belongs. The imperative necessity for this policy must be apparent to all who have studied the constantly increasing scope of aeronautics. Cooperation with and encouragement to inventors and manufacturers and a broad, intelligent policy is demanded. Practically all other countries have adopted that course, and ours must not fail at this crucial period to do so.

The future of aviation is beyond our present dreams or understanding, and our Government must do her full part in leading in its development.

Your committee has worked hard and faithfully for over six months and submits the record without apologies for whatever its value may be.

The committee of 15 selected to investigate War Department expenditures possesses no member, Republican or Democrat, who desired the thankless task that entailed hard work without reward. Once appointed, however, it became a public duty that could not be avoided.

The committee has endeavored to present a temperate, unbiased report, devoid of sensationalism, which is sustained in important essentials by the reports of Justice Hughes and the Thomas Senate subcommittee. The facts have been presented squarely, without inuendo, and responsibility has been lodged against those in positions of authority. Pages of record on which such testimony appears has been cited with names of witnesses. This was our commission from the House, and it has been faithfully performed.

Experience in prior investigations has disclosed whitewash reports and efforts to smother or discredit anything reflecting upon the War Department. In an effort to distract public attention from the reliable findings of fact reached by Justice Hughes and the Thomas committee, as stated at the outset of this report, apologists for indefensible inefficiency and extravagance may seek to mislead public opinion and endeavor to confuse the situation by reflections upon the committee which was unanimously selected by the House to get the facts. Such methods, if pursued, strikingly illustrate a course of procedure adopted in responsible quarters of trying to minimize anything affecting the Air Service, War Department, or administration. No Member of Congress can afford to take the position; and your committee presents the hearings, testimony, and report as conclusive evidence in support of the findings submitted.

If from the record we may find helpful suggestions regarding pitfalls to be avoided and a solution for the permanent advancement of aeronautics, then the money, time, and labor expended by your committee will not have been in vain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired. The rule under which this report has been considered by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union provides that upon the conclusion of said debate the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall automatically rise. Therefore the committee will now rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration House report No. 637, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the report indicate that the Committee of the Whole had come to no resolution on the matter?

Mr. HICKS. That is the way the Chair had reported, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a parliamentary inquiry: Is that the proper form in which it should be reported?

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman suggest any better form?

Mr. GARRETT. There was nothing before the House, nothing before the committee, nothing for action before the committee.

The SPEAKER. The House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the report. The Chair thinks that was the proper form.

Mr. GARRETT. All that was before the House, then, was the matter of debate upon it; and if that is all there is to be, I suggest that the matter has come to an end. The gentleman may relate that fact.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make any point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the Speaker permit me to propound a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that in the future—I suppose in the future we will have occasions of this sort——

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman on a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, now that under the program of the day it is in order for the Members of the House to resume their ordinary functions. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

TIME FOR HOLDING COURT IN LAURINBURG, N. C.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3696, changing the time of holding the United States district court in the eastern district of North Carolina at Laurinburg.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 3696) to change the time for holding court in Laurinburg, eastern district of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether there is any emergency about this, or whether it could just as well go over to unanimous-consent day?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois I will say that this changes the time of holding court from the last Monday in March to the Monday before the last Monday. It is desired, if it could be accomplished, that the legislation might be enacted so as to go into effect this month, and, as we have amended the bill in committee, it will have to go back to the Senate. If it has to wait until a week from next Monday, it was thought it might not become a law in time to permit its going into effect at this term.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is this the district in which Judge Webb lives?

Mr. WALSH. It may be; I am not certain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? If not, the Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was reframed, as I understand it, by the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is the chairman?

Mr. WALSH. It was.

Mr. GARD. It was thought to be entirely satisfactory from the standpoint of the adjustment with the present status?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman that the bill as originally drawn and as passed by the Senate would probably leave section 98 of the Judicial Code to consist of but six or eight lines and would eliminate the terms of court in various other places. The subcommittee amended the bill by providing an amendment of section 98 of the Judicial Code and incorporating in the amendment an amendment of an act passed some time ago with reference to holding court at Raleigh, N. C., and has now provided a measure which will amend section 98 of the Judicial Code in accordance with all amendments heretofore passed and as amended if this becomes a law.

Mr. GARD. The Senate form was stricken out and the House form substituted?

Mr. WALSH. That is correct. It was the view of the subcommittee that the Senate form was not in accordance with the practice which we have endeavored to follow in the Judiciary Committee, as the gentleman from Ohio knows.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act establishing terms of the district court in the city of Laurinburg, N. C., on the last Monday in September and March be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That terms of the district court for the eastern district of North Carolina shall hereafter be held in the city of Laurinburg on Monday before the last Monday in March and September instead of on the last Monday in September and March, as provided for in the original bill creating the terms of court at Laurinburg."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 98 of an act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911,' as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 98. The State of North Carolina is divided into two districts, to be known as the eastern and western districts of North Carolina. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Beaufort, Bertie, Bladen, Brunswick, Camden, Chatham, Cumberland, Currituck, Craven, Columbus, Chowan, Carteret, Dare, Duplin, Durham, Edgecombe, Franklin, Gates, Granville, Greene, Halifax, Harnett, Hertford, Hyde, Johnston, Jones, Lenoir, Lee, Martin, Moore, Nash, New Hanover, Northampton, Onslow, Pamlico, Pasquotank, Pender, Perquimans, Person, Pitt, Robeson, Richmond, Sampson, Scotland, Tyrrell, Vance, Wake, Warren, Washington, Wayne, and Wilson. Terms of the district court for the eastern district shall be held at Laurinburg on the Monday before the last Mondays in March and September; at Wilson on the first Mondays in April and October; at Elizabeth City on the second Mondays in April and October; at Washington on the third Mondays in April and October; at Newbern on the fourth Mondays in April and October; at Wilmington on the second Monday after the fourth Mondays in April and October; and at Raleigh on the fourth Monday after the fourth Mondays in April and October and in addition for the trial of civil cases on the first Mondays in March and September: Provided, That the city of Washington, the city of Laurinburg, and the city of Wilson shall each provide and furnish at its own expense a suitable and convenient place for holding the district court at Washington, at Laurinburg, and at Wilson until a courthouse shall be constructed by the United States. The clerk of the court for the eastern district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Raleigh, at Wilmington, at Newbern, at Elizabeth City, at Washington, at Laurinburg, and at Wilson, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court.

"'The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Alamance, Alexander, Ashe, Alleghany, Anson, Buncombe, Burke, Caswell, Cabarrus, Catawba, Cleveland, Caldwell, Clay, Cherokee, Davidson, Davie, Forsyth, Guilford, Gaston, Graham, Henderson, Haywood, Iredell, Jackson, Lincoln, Montgomery, Mecklenburg, Mitchell, McDowell, Madison, Macon, Orange, Polk, Randolph, Rockingham, Rowan, Rutherford, Stanly, Stokes, Surry, Swain, Transylvania, Union, Wilkes, Watauga, Yadkin, and Yancey. Terms of the district court for the western district shall be held in Greensboro on the first Mondays in June and December; at Statesville on the third Mondays in April and October; at Salisbury on the fourth Mondays in April and October; at Asheville on the first Mondays in May and November; at Charlotte on the first Mondays in April and October; and at Wilkesboro on the fourth Mondays in May and November. The clerk of the court of the western district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Greensboro, at Asheville, at Statesville, and at Wilkesboro, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court.'

"SEC. 2. That the act entitled 'An act providing for the establishment of two additional terms of the district court for the eastern district of North Carolina at Raleigh, N. C.,' approved April 27, 1916, is hereby repealed."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if there are any questions I shall be very glad to answer them; but as I stated before, this simply provides for changing the time of holding the district court at Laurinburg, N. C. It is desirable to have the time changed, because the term there now runs into the beginning of a new quarter. That involves the making out of new accounts after the books have been closed for the quarter ending March 31, the issuing of new checks for jurors and witnesses, and so forth. We have also incorporated into the amendment another act which provided for two additional terms of the western district at Raleigh. By incorporating that amendment and the one relating to the change of the term of court at Laurinburg, we have put section 98 of the Judicial Code into correct from as far as it relates to these terms in North Carolina.

Mr. GARD. Why was it necessary to incorporate section 2? There was no amendment of that. Section 98, as the gentleman recites, is amended by changing the time of holding the court at Laurinburg.

Mr. WALSH. We have inserted the separate act relating to Raleigh. We have included that in section 98 and repealed the separate act.

Mr. GARD. There is no section 1, and there ought not to be any section 2 of section 98.

Mr. WALSH. Section 2 of this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is a section 1 of this bill, although the words "section 1" are never written into a bill.

Mr. WALSH. We never say "section 1" of any bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, if the gentleman from Ohio has concluded.

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether there is any rule that he knows of which would prevent a Member from extending his remarks on the gentleman's bill? It is the only legislation we have had up to-day on which we could ask that permission, since 11 o'clock, and it is now 10 minutes to 4.

Mr. WALSH. I know of no rule that would prevent the gentleman from Texas getting in some remarks upon almost any measure before the House, with the exception of the matter which was under discussion in the Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to know that.

Mr. WALSH. That must be a great relief and a soothing balm to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We ought not to criticize the gentleman from Texas for complaining about a rule which for four hours did not permit him to make a speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. It is quite irksome to have that restriction imposed. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We fully believe that. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I thought the gentleman from Illinois was going to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether Laurinburg is in Judge Webb's district.

Mr. WALSH. It is not.

Mr. DUPRÉ. It is not, as I find after reading the counties which are named.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was going to ask if it was in Judge Webb's district, and whether it met with his approval?

Mr. WALSH. It meets with the approval of the judge in whose district it is.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. On that I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 0.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend section 98 of an act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911, as amended."

PRODUCTION OF COTTON IN GEORGIA.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes on a matter of interest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the gentleman from Missouri, Gov. RUBEY, called the attention of the House to the fact that one of his constituents had made the greatest yield of corn per acre of any other farmer in the country. This statement brought forth from various Members of the House instant claims, including a more favorable report made by the distinguished Member from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

I want to submit a statement in reference to the production of cotton per acre, which I believe can not be successfully challenged from any quarter.

In the first place, if my colleagues from Georgia will pardon me for an expression of my pride, I want to state that my district, which is the eighth congressional district of the State, during the year 1918 produced 316,892 bales of cotton, which was more than any other district in the State for that year, and during the year 1919 produced 335,587 bales, which was not only the greatest production of any district in the State, but almost twice as much as the next largest district, which was the sixth—represented by my friend, Mr. WISE—which yielded 185,681 bales. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. In view of this extraordinary yield, why the increase in the price of cotton?

Mr. BRAND. Because there was an increased demand for it all over the world. I thought everybody knew that. [Laughter and applause.]

But what I want to particularly call the country's attention to is the fact that a constituent of mine, living within 10 miles of my home at Athens, Ga., produced during the year 1919 more pounds of lint cotton per acre, on a crop of 5 acres at that, than any other planter or cotton producer in the United States.

For accomplishing this result Mr. J. O. M. Smith, of Ila, Madison County, captured the gold medal and $1,000 cash prize for the largest yield of lint cotton in the United States for 1919. This prize was one of 18 offered by the Farm Journal, of Philadelphia, for the best yield of six important crops—corn, wheat, cotton, oats, alfalfa, and potatoes. Five acres was the minimum crop for each entry. For each crop a gold medal and $1,000, a silver medal and $500, and a bronze medal and $250 were the prizes for the best yields. This contest was announced in 1918. The purpose of the contest, as announced, was to stimulate production of those crops which would help to win the war and help to feed and clothe the world after it was over. According to the official announcement of the Farm Journal, Mr. Smith produced 1,360.29 pounds of lint cotton per acre. This is due to the industry and intelligence of this progressive farmer—an achievement which is remarkable, and I believe unprecedented, in the history of cotton production. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that March 5 they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 12046. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

EX-SPEAKER CLARK.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow a very honored Member of this House reaches the age of three score years and ten, an age which is often referred to in both scriptural and other writings. I am sure we all felicitate the country upon his arrival at that age in vigorous health physically and with a mental alertness never excelled. I refer to the former Speaker of this House, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CULLEN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, voicing the unanimous good wishes of the House to the ex-Speaker, whose ripening age has just been referred to, and calling attention to the very remarkable fact that no gentleman from the Cotton States has risen to question the accuracy of the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 8, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting request for authority for use of appropriation in naval appropriation bill for 1921 for the purpose of converting either the Kearsarge or the Kentucky into a crane and salvage ship (H. Doc. No. 674); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Navy Department for a fleet landing and storehouse at San Diego, Calif., fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 675); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting deficiency estimate of appropriation required to meet the increased cost of blanks and books, Post Office Department, and payable from postal revenues (H. Doc. No. 676); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriations required by the War Department for the fiscal year 1921 for sites for fortifications and seacoast defense and armament for fortifications (H. Doc. No. 677); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BURDICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12887) establishing the liability of hotel proprietors and innkeepers in the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 719), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1279) granting an increase of pension to Freda Burow, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 8, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we are learning the larger lessons of life. As we stand day by day before the ever-increasing responsibilities of life, as we face responsibilities to-day, make us humble as we stand before them. Grant us grace to seek in our hearts and minds the divine guidance, that we may learn the path of larger service and wider usefulness, a path in which God will lead us in the performance of our sacred obligations. Give us the consciousness of the Divine Presence as we deal with the rights of the millions of Thy people. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, March 3, 1920, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

NAVAL AWARDS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in yesterday's papers there appears the substance of the majority and minority reports of the subcommittee in the controversy between Admiral Sims and the Secretary of the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I would like very much to have the opportunity to read those reports, as I am sure other Senators would, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. What are the reports?

Mr. POMERENE. The reports of the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs which investigated the controversy between Admiral Sims and the Secretary of the Navy concerning naval awards.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF NAVAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE ON THE QUESTION OF AWARDS IN THE NAVY.

On the 5th day of January, 1920, at a meeting of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate a subcommittee was appointed to investigate the question of awards in the Navy. The subcommittee was composed of Senator HALE, chairman, and Senators MCCORMICK, NEWBERRY, PITTMAN, and TRAMMELL. On January 24, owing to necessary absence from Washington, Senator NEWBERRY resigned from the subcommittee, and on February 2 Senator POINDEXTER was appointed by the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee to fill the vacancy.

The subcommittee has held many hearings, has examined many witnesses, and after careful study of the evidence has reached the conclusions hereinafter set forth in its report.

On February 4, 1919, the Congress enacted the law providing for awards in the Navy. On January 18, prior to the passage of the act, the Bureau of Navigation issued circular letter 7–19, which appears on page — of the record of the hearings, calling for recommendations from the commanding officers and force commanders. On March 6 the Secretary, in a letter to Rear Admiral Knight, which appears on page — of the record of the hearings, appointed a board, with Rear Admiral Knight as chairman, for the purpose of "recommending to the department those persons who are, in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress approved February 4, 1919, deemed by the board worthy of the award of the medals of honor, distinguished service medals, and Navy crosses provided for in said act."

The board considered the recommendations and citations, made three reports to the Secretary of the Navy, and on October 31, 1919, was dissolved by order of the Secretary of the Navy.

The Secretary of the Navy with whom, under the President, rested the final awarding of the honors, considered the recommendations of the board of awards, in some cases approved them, in others changed them, added some names that have not been acted upon by the board, and in his annual report for the year 1919 published a list of awards to be given in the Navy. Following the publishing of this report, certain officers refused to accept the awards given them or to be given them, and Admiral Sims, who had commanded our naval forces on the other side during the war, and Admiral Mayo, who had been commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet during the war, wrote letters to the Secretary of the Navy commenting on the manner in which the awards had been made. These letters and others on the subject of awards were published in the Army and Navy Journal and other papers in the country, and editorially and otherwise there was much criticism of the awards. On December 16 the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, Senator PAGE, wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Navy asking for the report of the Knight Board, and received two letters in reply, dated December 19 and January 3. These two letters and the letter of the chairman are published in the record of the hearings on pages 10 and 14. On December 24 the Secretary of the Navy ordered the board of awards, which had been dissolved the previous October, to reconvene on January 5, 1920, and that board is now in session. The order reconvening the board is found on page — of the record of the hearings.

In its hearings the subcommittee heard first certain of the officers making the recommendations for awards; second, the Knight Board of Awards; and third, the Secretary of the Navy.

In the course of the hearings certain matters not directly connected with the question of awards were brought out in the testimony of the witnesses. The subcommittee does not deem that it is within its province or powers at this time to pronounce upon these matters and will limit itself in its conclusions strictly to the question of awards. The whole purpose of the subcommittee throughout the hearings and in its report has been not to decide the personal differences between officers of the Navy or between officers of the Navy and officials of the Navy Department, but to assist in arriving at a settlement of the question of awards in the Navy which shall be for the best interests of the Navy. Many officers and men of the Navy have performed signal and heroic service during the World War. That these officers and men shall receive recognition proportionate to their service is the sincere desire of the subcommittee.

The statute providing for awards in the Navy, which, as stated in the foregoing circular of the Bureau of Navigation, was the department's bill, leaves to the President the right to grant the awards, restricting them, however, to services of an especial kind. In view of the fact that these restrictions are not as definite as might have been the case, it is the opinion of the subcommittee that an interpretation by the Secretary of the Navy of his understanding of the statute and the course which he meant to pursue in granting the awards, or, in other words, an outline of his policy would have been helpful to the various officers of the Navy in making up their recommendations for awards. Especially would an outline of the policy of the Secretary of the Navy in regard to the importance of sea duty as compared with shore duty have been helpful, and it is the belief of the subcommittee that had such a policy been announced, fewer changes would have been necessitated in making up the list of awards.

The subcommittee finds that in making the awards no attempt was made to ascertain from the officers making the recommendations the relative merit of the cases recommended, and that the question of relative merit was not considered as it should have been. This the subcommittee regards as most unfortunate. It is of the opinion that the commanding officer of a ship is best qualified to pronounce upon the relative merits of the officers and men on his ship; that the admiral of a fleet is best qualified to judge of the relative merits of the ship commanders under him, and also the members of his staff; that the admiral in command of a station is best qualified to judge of the relative merits of the officers and men under his command; and that the same principle applies from commanders to subordinates throughout the Navy. Had such a policy prevailed in the granting of awards under the statute, the subcommittee is of the opinion that the men most entitled to awards would have received them, and that if it had been found necessary to cut down the number to receive awards the least deserving men would have been the ones to be left out.

The subcommittee is of the opinion that the failure to employ some such system in making awards has been hurtful to the morale of the Navy, and has to a certain extent depreciated the value of the awards made. That the injury to the morale of the Navy will be permanent, the subcommittee does not believe. The subcommittee believes that the spirit of the Navy is such that it will rise above any temporary blow to its morale.

The subcommittee can not too strongly condemn the practice of giving awards to commanding officers in the Navy who have lost their ships unless in such cases they shall have shown such marked heroism or such signally distinguished service as shall have made them eligible for awards in spite of the loss of their ships. The subcommittee does not believe that because of the loss of their ships the commanding officers are necessarily ineligible for reward, but it does believe that in each such case these officers are on the defensive, and instead of the loss of their ships being taken as an opportunity where an award may be given, it is an obstacle, though not necessarily an insurmountable obstacle, in the way of an award. In all such cases of the loss of a ship, before an award should be given, the commanding officer should have rendered at least as high, if not a higher, degree of distinguished service or of heroism as in the cases of other officers who had not lost their ships.

The subcommittee does not believe that the Secretary of the Navy intended to award medals to commanding officers of ships which were lost in the war merely because their ships were lost, but it does believe that the Secretary did not require of these men a sufficient degree of distinguished service or of heroism to warrant the awards given them in some of the cases contained in his report for the year 1919, and it further believes that the Secretary has been more zealous in furthering the interests of commanders who have lost their ships than of other commanders who, instead of losing their ships, have destroyed or damaged the ships of the enemy.

The subcommittee is therefore firmly of the opinion that the policy laid down by the Secretary of the Navy in regard to awards to commanders who have lost their ships, in his letters of December 19 and January 13, will be detrimental to the United States Navy.

The subcommittee believes that it is not advisable to repeal the statute providing for awards in the Navy nor to amend it as far as relates to awards for services rendered during the late war, but it recommends that the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate ask the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board of officers of the Navy to consider the question of recommending changes in the statute for future awards.

The subcommittee further believes that in making final awards under the present statute in view of the fact that it would not be feasible in the present instance to follow the policy in regard to relative merits outlined by it, the best interests of the Navy will be consulted by the Secretary of the Navy if he follows the recommendations of the board of awards which is now in session and which as the Secretary of the Navy himself has said will consider not only the recommendations and citations of the officers and men of the Navy already in their possession but also the testimony given at the hearings of the subcommittee.

It hopes that the board of awards will be given full discretion to change or to continue any of its former recommendations according to the latest evidence which shall be in its hands and that the board will not be bound by the findings published in the report of the Secretary of the Navy for the year 1919.

It further hopes that the board will give especial attention to deserving cases among the enlisted men of the Navy and of the merchant marine who may be eligible under the statute. In many instances owing to the lack of explicitness in the statute as to its application to the enlisted men of the Navy and also to the length of time that had elapsed between the armistice and the making of the recommendations by the commanding officers and the consequent inaccessibility of the records the services of the enlisted men of the Navy have not received the recognition which they undoubtedly deserve.

REPORT BY KEY PITTMAN, MEMBER OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE NAVAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE, APPOINTED JANUARY 6 TO INVESTIGATE NAVAL AWARDS.

On the 4th day of February, 1919, the Congress of the United States passed an act entitled "An act to provide for the award of medals of honor, distinguished service medals, Navy crosses, and for other purposes."

All medals, crosses, and honors, under the act, are to be presented by the President of the United States.

The distinguished service medal is to be granted "to any person who, while in the naval service of the United States since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who hereafter shall distinguish, himself by exceptionally meritorious service to the Government in a duty of great responsibility."

The Navy cross is to be presented "to any person who, while in the naval service of the United States since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who shall hereafter distinguish, himself by extraordinary heroism or distinguished service in the line of his profession, such heroism or service not being sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor or a distinguished service medal."

The medal of honor is presented "to any person who, while in the naval service of the United States, shall, in action involving actual conflict with the enemy, distinguish himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty and without detriment to the mission of his command or the command to which attached."

It is usual to award and present such honors at the time the services are performed that entitle a person to them. The act, however, did not become a law until after the signing of the armistice. The Secretary, therefore, on the 18th day of January, 1919, caused an order to be issued to each of the commanders of naval forces directing that each of them immediately forward to the Navy Department a specific statement or report distinctly setting forth the act or distinguished service performed by any person while in the naval service entitling him to any one of the honors mentioned, and that in such report he make suggestions or recommendations for the proper official recognition.

On the 6th day of March, 1919, the Secretary of the Navy constituted and convened a naval board of awards to examine and consider the statements and reports concerning persons recommended for official recognition under the act. This board was further authorized to make suggestions to the Secretary with regard to the approval, modification, or disapproval of the recommendations of commanding officers with regard to such awards. This board was known as the Knight Board, and was composed of a number of high naval officers, with Admiral Austin M. Knight, Admiral Charles J. Badger, and Admiral De Witt Coffman at the head of such board.

This board on the 23d day of September, 1919, made its report with regard to about 4,000 recommendations for official recognition under the act. The board, in many cases, disapproved of the recommendations made by commanding officers. It may, however, be said in justice to such commanding officers that such disapproval, in most cases, was the result of a difference of opinion as to the degree of official recognition that should be given to the person recommended. For instance, in some cases where the commanding officer recommended a medal of honor the board changed the recommendation to a distinguished service medal or a Navy cross, or where the commanding officer recommended a Navy cross the board were of the opinion that the person was entitled to a distinguished service medal.

A careful reading of the provisions of the act above quoted will readily make apparent the difficulty of determining in many cases the award to which a person is entitled and accounts for the natural difference of opinion. It will be remembered that under the act a statement of the acts of the person recommended for official recognition must be contained in the report of recommendation. It was the duty of the board to carefully examine each of these statements of fact and upon such examination to determine whether the person recommended was entitled to a medal of honor or a distinguished service medal or a Navy cross or no recognition at all. No two of these cases were alike, and in many the classification was exceedingly difficult.

The Secretary of the Navy received the report of the board and made a careful examination of the statements of fact and recommendations in each case. On the 1st day of December, 1919, he filed a tentative report of recommendations for naval awards. In most cases the Secretary of the Navy, in his report, approved the action of the board. In some cases, however, he increased the reward of honor, while in others he decreased it. His action was based upon a difference of opinion as to the proper classification under the statements and reports submitted by the commanding officers with their recommendations.

Subsequent to the filing of the report by the Knight Board detailed statements, reports, and recommendations with regard to persons entitled to official recognition were received at the Navy Department. Additional evidence also came to the knowledge of the Secretary with regard to recommendations that had already been tentatively passed upon by him. In view of these circumstances, on the 5th day of January, 1920, he reconvened the Knight Board and rereferred to it not only the new cases that had come to his notice, but all of the recommendations theretofore made by commanding officers, by the board, and by himself, with full authority to take such further or different action as the board saw fit.

On the 17th day of December, 1919, Admiral Sims publicly charged that the morale of the Navy had been seriously affected by gross injustices done in the matter of such awards.

On the 6th day of January, 1920, the matter was brought to the attention of the Naval Affairs Committee of the United States Senate, and at the same time it was brought to the attention of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. The Naval Affairs Committee of the House declined to take any action with regard to such charges made by Admiral Sims. The Senate Committee was notified by the Secretary of the Navy that he had reconvened the Knight Board for the purpose of further investigation, action, and report with regard to all recommendations for awards. A motion was then made "that a subcommittee of five be appointed by the Chair to investigate the subject of the awarding of medals in the naval service, said committee to communicate with the House Naval Affairs Committee and ask them to join in this investigation." A substitute motion was then offered that the investigation be postponed until after the further report by the Knight Board, which was then in session. The substitute motion was lost and the original motion was carried.

On the 16th day of January, 1920, the subcommittee proceeded with the hearings, and Admiral Sims took the witness stand. In discussing the changes made by the board and by the Secretary of the Navy of the awards recommended by him it was called to his attention that the board in the great majority of the cases submitted had approved the recommendations of the commanding officers and that the Secretary of the Navy had also in the great majority of the cases approved the recommendations made by the commanding officers. To this Admiral Sims replied, and I quote his exact language: "It is not the number of cases but only the half dozen which are doing the damage."

Let us then consider these half dozen cases.

The first case of alleged injustice cited by the admiral was the action with regard to Commander J. V. Babcock. The admiral describes Commander Babcock in this language:

> This officer accompanied me to Europe in 1917; remained attached to my staff, returning to the United States in October, 1919; an officer of very unusual ability and possessed to a very unusual degree professional attainment. His assistance was invaluable to me. I consider that his services during the war were exceptionally brilliant and meritorious, and that he reflected the greatest possible credit upon the naval service.

Admiral Sims recommended Commander Babcock and 18 other members of his staff for distinguished service medals. These recommendations, together with all others, were referred to the Knight Board. The board approved of 6 of the admiral's recommendations for distinguished service medals, but as to the other 13 recommendations, it recommended the award of the Navy cross instead of the distinguished service medal. Commander Babcock was in this latter class. The board declined to approve Admiral Sims's recommendation that Commander Babcock be awarded the distinguished service medal, but recommended that he be given the Navy cross. The Secretary of the Navy approved the recommendation of the Knight Board in the matter with regard to the award to be given to Commander Babcock.

This illustrates the difference of opinion even among naval officers as to the grade of honor called for by particular services. It does not seem possible that such action by a great naval board could destroy the morale of such a Navy as we possess.

The admiral then cited the cases of Lieut. A. L. Gates, Ensign C. H. Hamman, Ensign G. H. Ludlow, and Capt. H. I. Cone.

According to the official record, Lieut. Gates was recommended by Admiral Sims for the congressional medal of honor. The board declined to approve the recommendation, and instead recommended the award of a distinguished service medal. The Secretary of the Navy adopted the recommendation of the board.

Ensign Hamman was recommended by Admiral Sims for the congressional medal of honor. The board declined to approve the recommendation, and instead recommended the award of a Navy cross. The Secretary of the Navy adopted the recommendation of the board.

Ensign Ludlow was recommended by Admiral Sims for a distinguished service medal. The board declined to approve of the recommendation, and instead recommended the award of a Navy cross. The Secretary of the Navy adopted the recommendation of the board.

Capt. Cone was recommended by Admiral Sims for a distinguished service medal. The recommendation was approved by the board. The Secretary of the Navy declined to accept the recommendation, and instead approved the award of a Navy cross.

There does not appear to be the slightest probability that such action by the Navy Department could in the slightest degree injure the morale of the Navy. In each and all of these cases the meritorious services of these junior officers were recognized and rewarded with a high honor. They were simply cases illustrating the natural difference of opinion even between high naval officers as to the character of honor a particular service calls for.

There was one other case that Admiral Sims called particular attention to and dwelt upon at length in his effort to sustain the charge that flagrant injustice in the half dozen cases was destroying the morale of the Navy. This was the case of Commander D. W. Bagley. The official report of this case is as follows:

> The U. S. destroyer Jacob Jones, under Commander D. W. Bagley, U. S. N., was at 4.21 p. m., December 6, 1917, sunk by a torpedo from an enemy submarine about 30 miles south of the Scilly Isles, in the English Channel, the ship sinking about 8 minutes after being struck. The report states that the destroyer was under way and steering zigzag courses at this time. The first evidence of the presence of the submarine was the sight of a torpedo about 1,000 yards distant and heading for the starboard beam of the ship and running at high speed of about 40 knots. Prompt action was taken to avoid the torpedo, without success. The ship settled rapidly by the stern and the aft end of the ship was quickly submerged. The depth charges exploded just as the stern sank.
> Every effort was made to launch the boats and raft, but considerable difficulty was encountered, caused by the wreckage due to the explosion. There was a total of 7 officers and 103 men on board, and 2 officers and 64 men lost their lives. The commanding officer, who was in the chart house, ordered every man to leave the ship and to jump clear, as it was sinking. He jumped overboard as the ship sank. The ship sank stern first and twisted slowly through nearly 180 degrees as she swung upright, and with the bow in the air in nearly a vertical position she went straight down. The report states that the explosion of the depth charges caused the death of a number of men and partially paralyzed and stunned a number of others, including Lieut. Kalk, Commander Bagley, and a number of men. A number of the boats were also destroyed by the explosion, which seriously interfered in the rescuing of the men. Lieut. S. F. Kalk lost his life from exposure as a result of his heroic work in swimming from one raft to another in an effort to equalize the weight on the rafts. In recognition of the heroic conduct of Lieut. Kalk a torpedo-boat destroyer has been named for him, and he was selected for a distinguished service medal.
> After being picked up by one of the boats Commander Bagley made an immediate effort to get all the survivors on the rafts and remaining boats. He then set out to row to the Scilly Islands, a distance of about 30 miles, in an endeavor to obtain assistance, but the boat was picked up by a small patrol vessel about 1 p. m. the next day, December 7, about 6 miles south of St. Marys Island, where he was informed that the other survivors had been rescued the night before. Many instances of heroic conduct by various officers and men of the ship are recorded. The radio instruments were so damaged by the explosion as to prevent sending the S O S signal.

The following extract from the testimony of Lieut. Norman Scott, United States Navy, executive officer and navigator of the Jacob Jones, is quoted:

"Q. State all you know concerning the loss of the Jacob Jones on December 6, 1917, which was not covered in the report of commanding officer, or may be at variance therewith.—A. Nothing; except I would like to call attention to the behavior of my commanding officer, Lieut. Commander David W. Bagley, at that time. He was partly stunned by the explosion of the depth charges, and when picked up was practically unconscious; but in spite of this, and realizing our desperate situation in not having sent out an S O S, he began to make arrangements to get assistance, and his actions while in charge of the men on this trip I consider remarkable. The condition of the weather at this time and the lack of equipment in the boat made navigation extremely difficult, and it was at Capt. Bagley's direction that we steered by the direction of the sea, and, as we found out next day, the course proved to be correct. In spite of his stunned condition throughout the entire trip, he was cheering up the men, two of whom were very low in vitality and spirit. At the time of the appearance of the submarine on the surface Capt. Bagley started to go to the submarine to give himself up, with the hope of getting assistance through the submarine for the surviving members of the crew. He told me at the time that he would rather die than do that. The submarine, however, disappeared before he could reach it."

The following is quoted from the finding of the court of inquiry: "That the commanding officer, officers, and men of the U. S. S. Jacob Jones bore themselves in accordance with the best traditions of the service. The court is of the opinion that the loss of the U. S. S. Jacob Jones was one of the hazards of war, and that no blame or responsibility attaches to any officer or man of the U. S. S. Jacob Jones in connection therewith."

On December 26, 1917, Admiral Sims approved the findings, opinion, and recommendation of the court, and writing, in his own hand, in London, under date of January 8, 1918, Admiral Sims said:

"Bagley's handling of the situation after his ship was torpedoed was everything I expected in the way of efficiency, good judgment, courage, and chivalrous action."

Admiral Sims, testifying with regard to the torpedoing of the Jacob Jones, said:

Just why the Jacob Jones was attacked, we only know from a report that has been given out since by Hans Rose, who was the man who attacked her (the same one who came over to Newport with the U–53), that he just took a chance shot at her from a distance of 2 miles, with probably one chance in a thousand of hitting her; but he did hit her.

Admiral Sims recommended Commander Bagley for the Navy cross. The board approved the award. The Secretary of the Navy recommended the award of a distinguished service medal.

There were several similar cases in which commanding officers had recommended the granting of distinguished service medals to officers who had lost their ships under similar circumstances, and such awards had been approved by the board. It became necessary therefore for the Secretary of the Navy to either reduce the award to such officers to a Navy cross or raise the award of all other officers who performed similar meritorious services under similar circumstances to that of a distinguished service medal. He raised all to distinguished service medals. The following are some of the similar cases in which distinguished service medals had been recommended and approved by the board:

The U. S. destroyer Cassin, under Commander W. N. Vernou, U. S. N., on October 15, 1917, was patrolling off the south coast of Ireland. At 1.30 p. m. a submarine was sighted and the destroyer headed for the submarine, which submerged and disappeared. About 30 minutes later a torpedo was seen coming toward the Cassin at high speed and about 400 yards distant. The Cassin was maneuvered to avoid the torpedo without success, and the ship was struck on her port side. * * * The ship was kept afloat and towed into port by the British destroyer Tamarisk, which was fortunately in the neighborhood.

Admiral Sims recommended Commander Vernou for a Navy cross. The naval board declined to approve the recommendation and instead recommended the award of a distinguished service medal.

The U. S. naval transport President Lincoln, under command of Commander Percy W. Foote, U. S. N., was sunk at about 9 a. m., on May 31, 1918, when about 500 miles off Brest, France, on making her return voyage to America. * * * The President Lincoln was struck by three torpedoes fired almost simultaneously from a German submarine, which it was afterwards learned was the U–90. Two torpedoes struck the ship in about the same place, the port side of the ship, and the third torpedo struck in the afterpart of the ship. The ship sank in about 30 minutes after being struck, and 23 men and 3 officers lost their lives.

The finding of the court of inquiry was as follows:

The court is of the opinion that the conduct of all officers and men of the U. S. S. President Lincoln and of the U. S. destroyers Warrington and Smith has reflected credit on the United States Navy.

The action of the court was approved by Rear Admiral Wilson, commander of the naval forces in France.

On June 3, Admiral Sims cabled the department reporting the circumstances attending the sinking of the President Lincoln and stated that "small loss of life is due to thorough discipline, ship's company, and excellent seamanship, Commander Foote."

Admiral Gleaves recommended Commander Foote for the distinguished service medal as follows: "It is recommended that Commander Percy W. Foote, United States Navy, be awarded the distinguished service medal for exceptionally meritorious service with the Government in a duty of great responsibility at the time of the torpedoing of the U. S. S. President Lincoln. Commander Foote's conduct on this occasion measured up to the best traditions of the service."

Admiral Mayo, commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet, approved the above recommendation as follows:

Forwarded. The commander in chief recommends that a distinguished service medal be awarded to Commander Percy W. Foote.

The U. S. S. San Diego, armored cruiser, under command of Commander H. H. Christy, United States Navy, at about 11.05 a. m., July 19, 1918, struck a mine when approaching the harbor of New York, south of Long Island. The records of the court of inquiry show that as a result of this explosion the ship finally rolled over and sank, bottom up, at 11.25 a. m., July 19, 1918, 20 minutes after striking the mine.

The court of inquiry found that—at the time of the disaster and thereafter the conduct of the captain, officers, and crew was in the highest degree commendable, and that the remarkably small loss of life was due to the high state of discipline maintained on board.

Admiral Gleaves recommended Capt. H. H. Christy for the distinguished service medal. The recommendation was approved by Admiral Mayo and by the board of awards. The Secretary of the Navy followed such recommendations.

The U. S. S. Mount Vernon, Navy transport, under command of Capt. D. E. Dismukes, United States Navy, was on the morning of September 26, 1918, struck by a torpedo from an enemy submarine. * * * Through the skill and good judgment of Capt. Dismukes and the officers in command of his ship, he was able to bring the Mount Vernon into port at Brest.

Admiral Gleaves recommended the award of a distinguished service medal to Capt. Dismukes. The recommendation was approved by Admiral Mayo. The board of awards recommended the distinguished service medal, and the recommendation was followed by the Secretary of the Navy.

The U. S. S. Tampa, Coast Guard cutter, under command of Capt. C. A. Satterlee, U. S. C. G., was sunk in the Bristol Channel, off the English coast, at about 8.45 p. m., on September 26, 1918. All on board were lost.

Rear Admiral Niblack, who was the commander of the patrol squadron based on Gibraltar, recommended that the distinguished service medal be awarded to Capt. Satterlee. The board of awards did not approve the recommendation, and instead recommended the Navy cross for Capt. Satterlee. The Secretary of the Navy disapproved of the recommendation of the naval board, approved of the recommendation of Admiral Niblack, and recommended the distinguished service medal.

The U. S. S. Minnesota, battleship, under command of Capt. J. V. Chase, United States Navy, struck a mine at 3.15 a. m., September 29, 1918, about 20 miles from Fenwick Island Shoal, on the United States Atlantic coast. She did not sink, however, and proceeded to port and arrived inside of Delaware Bay at 9.30 p. m., December 29.

The board of inquiry made the following finding:

The board is of the opinion that officers and crew deserve the highest praise for the manner in which the ship was handled after the explosion, for maintaining order, the localizing the injury to the ship, and for successfully navigating her into port.

Admiral Gleaves recommended that Capt. Chase be awarded the distinguished service medal. The recommendation was approved by Admiral Mayo; the board of awards recommended the distinguished service medal, and the recommendation was approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

The U. S. S. Alcedo, converted naval yacht, under command of Commander W. T. Conn., jr., United States Navy, while acting as escort to a convoy at 1.45 a. m., November 5, 1917, was struck by an enemy torpedo and sank in eight minutes.

Admiral Sims recommended the award of a Navy cross to Commander Conn. The board approved the recommendation. The Secretary of the Navy recommended the distinguished service medal in this statement:

His performance of duty on the Alcedo, the manner in which he remained at his post and sank with his ship, and his work in connection with the rescuing of the survivors was in keeping with the highest traditions of the service, and I directed that he be awarded a distinguished service medal.

The U. S. Army transport Finland, Capt. S. V. Graham, United States Navy, in command of naval armed guard on board, was struck by enemy torpedo at about 9.25 a. m., October 28, 1917, about 150 miles off the French coast. The ship was badly damaged, but was taken into port.

The court of inquiry found that "due to the prompt and efficient efforts of Capt. S. V. Graham, United States Navy, and Master Jensen, and Asst. Engineer Nikkelsen order was restored and the vessel enabled to returned to port."

Admiral Gleaves recommended Capt. Graham for a distinguished service medal. The recommendation was approved by Admiral Mayo, the Navy Board, and the Secretary of the Navy.

The U. S. Army transport Antilles, with Commander D. T. Ghent, United States Navy, in command of the Navy armed guard on board, was sunk on October 17, 1917, about 300 miles off the coast of France when making the return voyage to America.

Admiral Sims stated that "conduct of the members of the armed guard was a credit to the service, and the senior naval officer on the Antilles (Commander Ghent) carried out his duties efficiently."

As at that time the naval armed guards were not under any naval force commander, no recommendations were made. The Secretary of the Navy recommended the award of the distinguished service medal to Commander Ghent.

A comparison of the findings of the court of inquiry and the reports of the commanding officers in these various cases where the distinguished service medal was recommended with the findings of the court of inquiry and the reports in the case of Commander D. W. Bagley will, I believe, convince any unprejudiced mind that Bagley's case was similar to the others and that he was entitled to the same treatment as those officers who were recommended for distinguished service medals.

Admiral Sims in the letter that he addressed to the Secretary of the Navy under date of November 12, 1919, says: "In the case of destroyers or other vessels that were successfully attacked by German submarines, no special distinctions were recommended."

The foregoing cases that have just been cited completely contradict Admiral Sim's statement.

The commander of the San Diego lost his ship, but he was recommended by his commanding officers and by the board for the distinguished service medal.

The commander of the President Lincoln lost his ship, but he was recommended by his commanding officers and by the board for the award of the distinguished service medal.

Capt. Satterlee lost his ship, but his commanding officers recommended him for the distinguished service medal and the Secretary of the Navy approved the recommendation.

Admiral Sims, in his letter to the Secretary of the Navy, referred to, says:

> By reason of the peculiar nature of the submarine warfare, no blame attaches to the commanding officers of these vessels for their failure, but on no account should they receive a special reward for this lack of success.

Admiral Mayo, Admiral Gleaves, Admiral Wilson, and Admiral Niblack apparently did not hold the same views with regard to such matters, as each and all of them recommended for distinguished service medals commanding officers who were not successful when attacked by submarines and who lost their ships.

Admiral Sims did recommend a special reward to Commander D. W. Bagley. He recommended the award of a Navy cross. This is but a slightly lesser honor than a distinguished service medal. Is it possible that Admiral Sims does believe that the granting of a distinguished service medal to Bagley, under the circumstances, instead of the Navy cross that he recommended, can destroy the morale of the Navy?

Admiral Sims testified that it was the policy of the British Navy not to give an officer who lost his ship another command, even though the ship was lost through no fault of the officer. He approved such policy. It is apparent that Admiral Sims has been deeply impressed with British policies and practices. In fact, his constant reference in his testimony to the Victoria Cross and other matters purely British would lead a civilian to the conclusion that possibly Admiral Sims is more familiar with British ideas, customs, and manners than with those of his own country.

The admiral made this indorsement upon the back of a list that was submitted to him for recommendation for awards: "The line of demarcation between the distinguished service medal and the Navy cross is not clear to me * * *." And then after quoting this indorsement the admiral testified: "You see, we had to guess at what these meant."

The Secretary of the Navy furnished Admiral Sims with the act describing the different medals, and yet he seemed incapable of interpreting the statute. I quote from the testimony:

> Senator PITTMAN. Admiral, I have not had time to look over this list, but how many enlisted men did you recommend for a medal, or honor, or distinguished service recognition?
>
> Admiral SIMS. We had no opportunity to, because they balled this thing up so badly in the law that we have not got the graded medals to give them. What they should have had is a minimum. There were three different grades, classes of medals for distinguished service and three different grades for heroism, the Victoria Cross and two other ones below, so we could do that.
>
> Senator PITTMAN. Do you mean to say that you have no knowledge of any enlisted man participating in services such as these officers have performed?
>
> Admiral SIMS. We have such cases in which we would be allowed to give them something less than the Victoria Cross, something less than the citations, but we had nothing to give them at all.
>
> Senator PITTMAN. Even though they performed the actions that certain officers performed?
>
> Admiral SIMS. Yes.
>
> Senator PITTMAN. Were they not entitled to exactly the same medals as officers?
> Admiral SIMS. That is what they do in the Croix de Guerre and the Victoria Cross. All the rest of the Governments give them.

Admiral Sims did not recommend a single enlisted man for a distinguished service medal. As throwing some light upon the policy which Admiral Sims adopted in making up his list for recommendation for the award of various honors and as a justification of the board and of the Secretary of the Navy in refusing to approve of many of the admiral's recommendations, I quote the following from the testimony of Admiral Sims:

> Moreover, if I hear that this man here has sent in a great many recommendations for distinguished service medals, more than I would think it was proper to send in, I would not like to send in less, for fear of injuring the morale of my command; but I would send in as many, in the hope that the board of awards would scale them all down parallel.

In view of such statement Admiral Sims should not even be surprised that the naval board only approved 28 out of 75 of the recommendations made by him for distinguished service medals. His opinion of the naval board, composed of some of the most distinguished admirals in our Navy, is aptly disclosed by the following colloquy during the testimony:

> Senator PITTMAN. Would it not be rather strange if you did recommend these men for the highest honor that the board would cut them down to the lowest grade?
>
> Admiral SIMS. It would be strange; so it is.
>
> Senator PITTMAN. But you have every confidence in that board, have you not?
>
> Admiral SIMS. I have not.

From the foregoing statement of facts, and a careful review of all of the evidence, I am forced to the following conclusions:

CONCLUSIONS.

1. That the investigation by the subcommittee was entirely unnecessary, because at the time of the appointment of the committee the entire matter, by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, was being reinvestigated by the Knight Board of Awards.

2. The investigation, like most congressional investigations of this character, has served no beneficial purpose, but, on the contrary, in my opinion, through the airing of the personal grievances of an admiral and in giving publicity to critical and deprecatory statements made by the admiral with regard to the accomplishment of the American Navy during the Great War, has tended to besmirch a glory that was never before questioned.

3. The policy with regard to the awarding of the medals was laid down by Congress in the act and could not be changed by the Secretary of the Navy, or any commanding officer, or anyone else. The Secretary of the Navy pursued the only practical policy in sending each commanding officer a copy of the act, with directions that he not only make recommendations but that he send in a statement and report of the facts justifying the recommendation in each case, and then submitting all of such recommendations and the accompanying statements and reports to a naval board composed of high naval officers.

4. That Admiral Sims is sincerely convinced that no naval board is competent to review and act upon any recommendation made by him; that the changing in the slightest degree of any award to any officer made by him is so grave an error that it would be better that no medals be awarded at all; that he believes that the awarding of the distinguished service medal should be limited to a few of the highest officers in the Navy, and that it has been cheapened by being awarded to so many junior officers and enlisted men.

5. That the whole dispute has developed into a tempest in a teapot and is too ridiculous to be mentioned in connection with the morale of a fighting Navy.

6. That the expressed determination of the Secretary of the Navy to hold open the matter of permanent awards until reports concerning enlisted men and fuller reports concerning officers can be obtained, considered, and acted upon by the Naval Board is the proper policy to be pursued.

KEY PITTMAN,
Member of the Subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee of the United States Senate on Naval Awards.

REPORT BY PARK TRAMMELL, MEMBER OF SUBCOMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 5, 1920.

On January 6, 1920, your committee adopted a resolution providing as follows, to wit:

> That a subcommittee of five be appointed by the Chair to investigate the subject of the awarding of medals in the naval service.

In conformity with the said resolution you named the members of the said subcommittee, and the subcommittee so designated has conducted and concluded the investigation which it was authorized and directed to make.

As a member of this subcommittee, I desire to submit to you the following report, to wit:

The inquiry and investigation, in the main, was upon the following subjects:

First. The method and system which governs in awarding special decorations in the naval service.

Second. The official action and records of the Secretary of the Navy and various naval officers in making awards of medals.

Third. Whether or not any decoration was awarded to any officer or officers on account of the loss of a ship.

Fourth. The effect upon the morale of the Navy as a result of the manner in which the awarding of medals has been conducted.

The law governing the award of medals was approved February 4, 1919. By this statute there is provided:

First. A medal of honor.

Second. A distinguished service medal.

Third. A Navy cross.

The medal of honor is to be awarded to—

A person who, while in the naval service of the United States, shall, in action involving actual conflict with the enemy, distinguish himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty and without detriment to the mission of his command or the command to which attached.

The distinguished service medal is to be awarded to—

A person who, while in the naval service of the United States, since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished or who hereafter shall distinguish himself by exceptionally meritorious service to the Government in a duty of great responsibility.

The Navy cross is to be awarded to—

A person, who while in the naval service of the United States since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who shall hereafter distinguish himself by extraordinary heroism or distinguished service in the line of his profession, such heroism or service not being sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor or a distinguished service medal.

The statute governing this subject does not provide in detail the system to be adopted in its execution. The manner of the administration of the law therefore rests with the Navy Department, restricted only by the expressed provisions of the law.

The testimony discloses that the first action looking to a special decoration of an officer or an enlisted man was for his naval superior to make a statement or report setting forth the act and distinguishing service, and suggesting or recommending official recognition thereof, which said report was made through official channels. The superior officer to the officer who initiated the report and suggestion exercised the right to either approve or disapprove the recommendation made by his subordinate officer. This discretion seems to have prevailed with all officers who had to consider the original statement and suggestion that special recognition should be given to a specific officer or enlisted man.

As an illustration, a commanding officer may set forth facts which in his opinion entitled a particular person to a distinguished service medal and recommend the award of the same. His superior officer who in official channels next considers the report and recommendation may disapprove of the award of a distinguished service medal and recommend a Navy cross, or may disapprove of awarding any special recognition in the case.

This policy of exercising the discretion to disapprove or recommend a modification of the initial suggestion or recommendation seems to have prevailed with all officers who had jurisdiction over the subject of the award of special decorations.

As might have been expected, the testimony discloses that in a number of cases there was a conflict of opinion on the part of the officers who passed upon the question of whether or not the case under consideration was one in which an award should be made, and, if made, the character of the medal that should be awarded. This divergence of opinion prevailed between many of the naval officers, as well as between a number of the naval officers and the Secretary of the Navy. Each officer and the Secretary of the Navy appear from the testimony to have acted in accordance with their own judgment after giving consideration to the facts and the recommendations in the particular case being passed upon. This general policy prevailed throughout the Navy, without an exception, as far as disclosed by the testimony.

The hearing developed the fact that there was more or less conflict of opinion on the part of some of the naval officers as to the degree of recognition which should be given to the members of the staff of certain officials ashore as in contrast with officers who were serving at sea.

Admiral Sims, whose complaint brought about the investigation, took the position that 19 officers upon his staff should be awarded the distinguished service medal, and that 13 should be awarded the Navy cross; and, while he requested this special recognition for 32 members of his staff, he took the position that a number of officers who were serving at sea in the war zone should not have been awarded the distinguished service medal.

On the other hand, Admirals Mayo and Gleaves and the board of awards had recommended the award of the distinguished service medal to several of these particular officers at sea about which Admiral Sims made complaint. Admirals Mayo and Gleaves were commanding at sea, and Admiral Sims was in London most of the time performing his duties and did not command at sea during the war.

It appears from the hearing that each of the naval officers and the Secretary of the Navy acted within the authority vested in them under the regulations and the law in making recommendations for the award of special decorations. In each case, however, the final decision rested with the Secretary of the Navy, and he acted within the law when he made any changes in the recommendations which had been made to him by his subordinates.

The board of awards was not a statutory board but a board which was created by the Secretary of the Navy to pass upon all cases and make its recommendations to the Secretary for his final consideration.

It does not seem to have been the custom for any of the naval officers or the board of awards to advise with their subordinates when they proposed to disapprove or make a change in the recommendations which had been made to them by subordinate officers. The Secretary, therefore, when he failed to confer with Admiral Sims relative to the changes he proposed to make in the recommendations which had been made to him by Admiral Sims was acting within the policy which seems to have been followed by Admiral Sims and all other naval officers and the board of awards. Under these circumstances and the practice and custom which prevailed throughout the Navy in dealing with the award of special decoration I do not share in the criticism of the Secretary of the Navy by Admiral Sims on account of him having exercised his own discretion and judgment upon the subject. To say that he was in error in exercising his own judgment and discretion would be to also condemn Admirals Sims, Mayo, Gleaves, Grant, and Niblack, the board of awards, and all other naval officers who have made recommendations, because they, too, exercised their own judgment and discretion and in a number of instances disapproved or modified the recommendations which had been submitted to them for consideration.

The testimony disclosing, as it did, that such a large number of officers had been recommended for special decoration, and so few enlisted men had been recommended, I am impressed that those whose duty it was to initiate citations and recommendations were recreant in the performance of their duty in so far as the enlisted men are concerned. The same vigilance should have been exercised in ascertaining the enlisted men who were entitled to distinction as was exercised in regard to the officers. I am impressed from the testimony that this was not true.

One of the subjects inquired into by your committee was as to whether or not any officer had been awarded a medal on account of the loss of or the serious damage to his ship while in combat with the enemy, and as to whether or not the Secretary of the Navy had made an award to any officer for such reason. The testimony developed the fact that neither the Secretary of the Navy nor any naval officer had awarded or recommended the award of a medal on account of great damage to a ship or the loss of a ship when in combat with the enemy. The hearing developed that certain officers who were commanders of ships that were badly damaged or lost were recommended for the award of special decoration, but the testimony shows that such recommendations and awards were not based upon the fact that the ship had been damaged or lost. Because an officer's ship suffered loss or damage was not, however, held by the Secretary of the Navy, the board of awards, Admiral Sims, Admiral Mayo, Admiral Gleaves, and other officers of the Navy to be a reason for precluding an officer from a recommendation for and the award of a medal.

Each of the admirals referred to, the board of awards, and the Secretary of the Navy did in certain cases recommend the award of special decoration to certain officers who had come in contact with the enemy and were so unfortunate as to have their ships either badly damaged or sunk. Some of these officers recommended the Navy cross, while others recommended the distinguished service medal. Their action in making recommendations in such cases establishes the fact that none of the naval officers nor the Secretary of the Navy entertained the opinion that an officer should be excluded from special recognition because his ship had been damaged or lost on account of the blow of the enemy. There seems to be no difference of opinion, judging from the recommendations which were made, between the naval officers and the Secretary of the Navy regarding this main question.

The difference is only one as to the degree of the special recognition to the officer whose record, conduct, bravery, and resourcefulness, considered as a whole, may entitle him to a medal. As illustrating the fact that the damage or loss of a ship was not held to preclude an officer from the award of a medal, I desire to bring to the attention of the committee the following cases, to wit:

Capt. S. V. Graham, whose ship, the U. S. Army transport Finland, was badly damaged by the enemy, was recommended by Admirals Mayo and Gleaves of the board of awards for a distinguished service medal, and was awarded such medal by the Secretary of the Navy.

Commander Percy W. Foote, of the U. S. naval transport President Lincoln, whose ship was sunk by the enemy's attack, was recommended for the distinguished service medal by Admiral Gleaves, Admiral Mayo, and the board of awards, and such medal was awarded to him by the Secretary of the Navy.

Capt. H. H. Christy, of the U. S. S. San Diego, whose ship was sunk by a mine, was recommended for a distinguished service medal by Admiral Gleaves, Admiral Mayo, and the board of awards, and such medal was awarded to him by the Secretary of the Navy.

Capt. D. E. Dismukes, of the U. S. S. Mount Vernon, Navy transport, had his ship struck by a torpedo from an enemy submarine and badly damaged. He was recommended by Admiral Gleaves, Admiral Mayo, and the board of awards for a distinguished service medal, and these recommendations were approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

Capt. J. V. Chase, of the U. S. S. Minnesota, battleship, whose ship was struck by a mine and badly damaged, was recommended by Admiral Gleaves, Admiral Mayo, and the board of awards for a distinguished service medal. Their recommendation was approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

Capt. C. A. Satterlee, of the U. S. S. Tampa, whose ship was sunk and all on board lost, was recommended by Admiral Niblack for a distinguished service medal and by the board of awards for a Navy cross, and the Secretary of the Navy awarded him a distinguished service medal.

Commander W. N. Vernou, whose ship, the U. S. destroyer Cassin, was badly damaged by the enemy, was recommended by Admiral Sims for a Navy cross and by the board of awards for the distinguished service medal, and the board's recommendation was approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

Commander W. T. Conn, jr., whose ship, the U. S. S. Alcedo, converted naval yacht, was struck by the enemy and sank in eight minutes, was recommended by Admiral Sims and the board of awards for a Navy cross and was awarded a distinguished service medal by the Secretary of the Navy.

Commander D. W. Bagley, whose ship, the U. S. destroyer Jacob Jones, was sunk by a torpedo from an enemy submarine, was recommended by Admiral Sims and the board of awards for a Navy cross, and was awarded a distinguished service medal by the Secretary of the Navy.

Commander D. T. Ghent, of the U. S. Army transport Antilles, whose ship was sunk by the enemy, was awarded a distinguished service medal by the Secretary of the Navy. His case was investigated at first hand by the Secretary of the Navy, and none of the subordinates to the Secretary considered or passed upon the same.

This covers the record of the officers who were recommended for some form of decoration, even though their ships had been badly damaged or lost, there being a total of 10.

The board of awards passed upon 9 out of the 10 cases, and recommended 6 of the officers for distinguished service medals and 3 for the Navy cross. Of the three recommended by the board for the Navy cross, for Capt. C. A. Satterlee, of the U. S. S. Tampa, Admiral Niblack recommended a distinguished service medal.

Admiral Gleaves and Admiral Mayo considered 5 out of the 10 cases and recommended a distinguished service medal in each of the 5 cases considered by them.

Three of the 10 cases were passed upon by Admiral Sims, and in each instance he recommended a Navy cross.

No naval officer had under consideration the matter of an award to Commander D. T. Ghent, of the U. S. Army transport Antilles.

The Secretary of the Navy awarded a distinguished service medal to each of the 10 officers who commanded these ships that were either badly damaged or lost. This record clearly establishes the fact that in considering the entire 10 cases in question no naval officer nor the board of awards saw proper to exclude an officer from special decoration on account of his misfortune to have had his ship badly damaged or lost by a blow from the enemy.

The testimony further discloses that the fact that an officer's ship was badly damaged or lost was not the reason why he was recommended for a medal by those making such recommendations, and that he was not for this reason awarded a medal by the Secretary of the Navy.

As to the effect upon the morale of the Navy as a result of the manner in which the awarding of medals has been conducted, it is my opinion, as far as the testimony discloses, that the morale has not been seriously impaired. Doubtless some individuals have been displeased on account of having their hopes shattered and their pride of opinion wounded, but these are individual cases, and the testimony did not disclose that there is any general dissatisfaction prevailing throughout the Navy.

On account of not having a copy of the printed testimony, I have been unable to cite the different pages upon which the testimony appears in support of the different features of my report.

Respectfully submitted.

PARK TRAMMELL,
Member of the Subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee of the United States Senate on Naval Awards.

FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 247).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting, in response to a resolution of October 3, 1919, a detailed statement of the character, amount, and estimated cost of the work of the commission which has relation to the foreign commerce of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MEMBER OF POSTAL SALARY COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the authority of section 3 of the act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, approved February 28, 1919, the Chair appoints LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS, a Senator from the State of Colorado and a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, a member of the commission authorized by that section to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD, late a Senator from the State of Alabama.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3696) to change the time for holding court in Laurinburg, eastern district of North Carolina, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

COURT IN LAURINBURG, N. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3696) to change the time for holding court in Laurinburg, eastern district of North Carolina, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 98 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911," as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 98. The State of North Carolina is divided into two districts, to be known as the eastern and western districts of North Carolina. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Beaufort, Bertie, Bladen, Brunswick, Camden, Chatham, Cumberland, Currituck, Craven, Columbus, Chowan, Carteret, Dare, Duplin, Durham, Edgecombe, Franklin, Gates, Granville, Greene, Halifax, Harnett, Hertford, Hyde, Johnston, Jones, Lenoir, Lee, Martin, Moore, Nash, New Hanover, Northampton, Onslow, Pamlico, Pasquotank, Pender, Perquimans, Person, Pitt, Robeson, Richmond, Sampson, Scotland, Tyrrell, Vance, Wake, Warren, Washington, Wayne, and Wilson. Terms of the district court for the eastern district shall be held at Laurinburg on the Monday before the last Mondays in March and September; at Wilson on the first Mondays in April and October; at Elizabeth City on the second Mondays in April and October; at Washington on the third Mondays in April and October; at Newbern on the fourth Mondays in April and October; at Wilmington on the second Monday after the fourth Mondays in April and October; and at Raleigh on the fourth Monday after the fourth Mondays in April and October and, in addition, for the trial of civil cases on the first Mondays in March and September: Provided, That the city of Washington, the city of Laurinburg, and the city of Wilson shall each provide and furnish at its own expense a suitable and convenient place for holding the district court at Washington, at Laurinburg, and at Wilson until a courthouse shall be constructed by the United States. The clerk of the court for the eastern district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Raleigh, at Wilmington, at Newbern, at Elizabeth City, at Washington, at Laurinburg, and at Wilson, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court.

"The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Alamance, Alexander, Ashe, Alleghany, Anson, Buncombe, Burke, Caswell, Cabarrus, Catawba, Cleveland, Caldwell, Clay, Cherokee, Davidson, Davie, Forsyth, Guilford, Gaston, Graham, Henderson, Haywood, Iredell, Jackson, Lincoln, Montgomery, Mecklenburg, Mitchell, McDowell, Madison, Macon, Orange, Polk, Randolph, Rockingham, Rowan, Rutherford, Stanly, Stokes, Surry, Swain, Transylvania, Union, Wilkes, Watauga, Yadkin, and Yancey. Terms of the district court for the western district shall be held in Greensboro on the first Mondays in June and December; at Statesville on the third Mondays in April and October; at Salisbury on the fourth Mondays in April and October; at Asheville on the first Mondays in May and November; at Charlotte on the first Mondays in April and October; and at Wilkesboro on the fourth Monday in May and November. The clerk of the court for the western district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Greensboro, at Asheville, at Statesville, and at Wilkesboro, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act providing for the establishment of two additional terms of the district court for the eastern district of North Carolina at Raleigh, N. C.," approved April 27, 1916, is hereby repealed.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend section 98 of an act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911, as amended."

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The amendments were agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry teachers of the public schools of Newton, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Smith-Towner bill, providing for a Department of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Farmers' Union of Washington County, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation permitting farmers' organizations for collective bargaining, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Earl Collier Post, No. 1, American Legion, of Olathe, Kans., and a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Ottawa, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation providing a bonus for ex-service men, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Natoma, Newton, Cimarron, Morrill, Howard, and Robinson, all in the State of Kansas, and of sundry citizens of Lutie, Okla., Lorenzo, Nebr., Booneville, Ark., remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

RECLASSIFICATION OF SALARIES.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 160) to provide for the preservation and maintenance of the records of the Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries, reported it with an amendment.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE, WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On behalf of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], I submit two reports from the Committee on Commerce and ask for the immediate consideration of the bills.

From the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12164) to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River between the towns of Pasco and Kennewick, in the State of Washington, I report it back favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 464) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles G. Huber, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, be, and he or they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, such bridge to extend from the east bank of said river adjacent to the town of Pasco, Wash., at a point not more than 2 miles upstream from the Northern Pacific Railway bridge across said river, to a point on the west bank of said river adjacent to the town of Kennewick, Wash., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NESTUCCA RIVER BRIDGE, OREG.

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12213) authorizing F. R. Beals to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nestucca River, in Tillamook County, Oreg., and I submit a report (No. 465) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted to F. R. Beals and his assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Nestucca River, in Tillamook County, Oreg., connecting the northerly part of lot 1 with the northerly part of lot 10, in section 30, township 4 south, range 10 west, Willamette meridian, in Oregon, and at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WHEAT POOL.

Mr. SMOOT. In behalf of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] I report back favorably, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Senate resolution 319, submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 319), submitted by Mr. REED on the 2d instant, was read, as follows:

Whereas the Federal grand jury sitting at Spokane, Wash., on February 29 made a report containing certain charges against the United States Grain Corporation and its directors of reported speculations in wheat; and

Whereas an account of such report was on March 1 made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be directed to inquire into the reported wheat pool and investigate the United States Grain Corporation, and the dealings, operations, speculations, and manipulations if any there has been of such Grain Corporation, its officers and agents, in wheat and wheat products, and report thereon to the Senate, together with their recommendation of any steps which they may deem it necessary to take in view of the findings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The resolution will go to the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4028) to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4029) for releasing and quitclaiming all claims of the United States to the west 144 feet of arpent lot 79, old city of Pensacola, Escambia County, Fla.; and

A bill (S. 4030) for releasing and quitclaiming all claims of the United States to lot 319 in the old city of Pensacola, situated on the south side of Garden Street, between Alcaniz and Tarragona Streets; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4032) to amend section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States and establishing the bureau of naturalization," approved June 29, 1906, as amended, and section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend the naturalization laws and to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States and other laws relating to naturalization, and for other purposes," approved May 9, 1918, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 4033) to amend subdivision 15, schedule A, of title XI of the revenue act of 1918; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4034) granting an increase of pension to George W. Manwell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRONNA (for Mr. MCCUMBER):

A bill (S. 4035) regulating the practice of chiropractic in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4036) granting a pension to Mary E. Carter (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4037) granting an increase of pension to William L. Ronner (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN (by request):

A bill (S. 4039) to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of June 28, 1906, entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS OF COTTON.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 4031) to regulate interstate shipments of cotton, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask leave to make a brief statement in regard to the bill.

The bill I introduce provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall establish and enforce preferential rates on shipments of cotton based upon the cubic contents of the bale, and in reaching its decision the commission shall take into consideration the density of the bale, the amount of space it occupies, its uniformity in size, the character of its covering as a safeguard against damage or fire, and any other points that seem fairly to entitle it to favorable discrimination.

The object of the bill is to secure fair treatment for interstate shipments of high-density gin-compressed cotton, both round and square bales.

We follow to-day in the baling and handling of 90 per cent of our great cotton crop, valued last year at $2,000,000,000, the antiquated and slovenly methods of 60 years ago. No other world product is given the criminally careless treatment which cotton receives in being marketed.

High-density gin compression is the most practical reform, and if universally followed would save more than $100,000,000 a year.

Ordinary plantation bales weigh 500 pounds, have a density of 12 pounds per cubic foot, and occupy 42 cubic feet of space; when compressed these bales have a density of 22½ pounds and occupy 22½ cubic feet. Gin-compressed bales have a density of 32 to 39 pounds and occupy 13 to 16 cubic feet. It thus appears that the space required by this high-density bale is only from one-third to two-thirds that of an ordinary gin or compress bale. A freight car will carry 35 gin bales, 75 compressed bales, and 110 high-density bales, or 8.75 tons of gin bales, 18.75 tons of compressed, and 27.5 tons of high-density bales.

In spite of these facts, the railroads deny any preference to the small compact high-density bales, although trans-Atlantic steamers give them an advantage of $1.25 per bale. My bill would guarantee a just and reasonable preference in proportion to the smaller amount of space occupied by these high-density bales.

I move that the bill be referred to the Commitee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

DEVELOPMENT OF RADIO COMMUNICATION.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I introduce a bill which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I will state that it is a bill for the coordination of the regulation and control of radio telegraphy.

The bill (S. 4038) to regulate the operation of and to foster the development of radio communication in the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In that connection I ask to present, to accompany the bill, a report from the Navy Department which shows the development of radio telegraphy during the war by the Navy Department, which I think is quite informing, and shows remarkable efficiency on the part of the Navy in the accomplishments which it achieved in that service. I ask that the report be printed as a Senate document and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and report of the Navy Department will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the report will be printed as a Senate document.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the shipping commissioner at Galveston, Tex., from $1,500 to $2,500, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. EDGE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYEES OF AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 327), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to report to the Senate the number of persons employed in the Department of Agriculture, together with a division of such employees into classes, with the number employed in each class, which classification shall show separately the number of persons employed as scientists and experts, the number of persons employed in the District of Columbia and in each of the several States, Territories, and possessions of the United States, the number of persons employed in the Department of Agriculture separately for each year for the 10 years last past, the total appropriations and deficiencies separately for each of the 10 fiscal years last past, the amount and percentage of such appropriations used for expenditures other than salaries, wages, traveling expenses, and office expenses, and the character of such expenditures.

ALASKAN RAILROAD.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer a short resolution asking for information from the Department of the Interior, which I should like to have adopted. I am satisfied that it will involve no debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 329) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to advise the Senate—

1. What steps have been taken or are being taken to develop and settle the country traversed by and tributary to the Government railroad being constructed in Alaska.

2. What steps have been taken or are being taken to develop traffic for such railroad when built.

3. Has any organization been created charged with the duty of settling this country and developing traffic for the road; if not, why has such organization not been formed?

LOANS ON GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to take this occasion, in lieu of introducing a resolution, which I had intended to do, to call the attention of the Committee on Banking and Currency to certain communications which I have received from constituents of mine and citizens of other States in reference to the condition existing in the discount or rediscount of Liberty bonds in our reserve banks. They are complaining that when the 4¼ per cent bonds are hypothecated for a loan the discount is 5 per cent. The result is that they sustain a loss in attempting to negotiate these bonds and that other paper which they hold is better collateral than the Government bonds.

Mr. President, I do not know just what legislation is needed, if any, but it is manifest to any business man that if bonds which bear 4¼ per cent interest issued by the Government are to be accepted as the basis of a loan at a rate of discount or rediscount of 5 per cent it is no wonder why the bonds are now below par and that they will go still further below par, because other bonds as collateral bearing a higher rate of interest are discounted in some instances at a lower rate of interest at the reserve bank.

It is a matter which I think the Committee on Banking and Currency ought to take into consideration to see if some relief can not be given, because it is manifest that when every bank that patriotically took these liabilities of the Government for a patriotic reason and loaded themselves up with them and have carried them, and now, when they reach a point where they want to realize on the paper in attempting to rediscount or discount at the bank hypothecating them for collateral for the issuance of a loan are charged 5 per cent, the consequence is that they have been disposing of those bonds wherever they can get rid of them in order to convert them even at a loss into better interest-bearing and more negotiable paper.

I have taken this occasion to call the attention of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency to this fact.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, one of the things which has had the effect of depressing the value of the bonds is the extraordinarily high rates of interest which have prevailed upon the stock exchanges.

The statutes of New York are so framed that a note of $5,000 or more which is secured by collateral is not subject to the laws of usury. Money lenders can now charge 100 per cent for such loans. There is no usury law in New York on loans of $5,000 which are secured by collateral. So the practice has prevailed, when it was desired to stop speculation or to cause a "bear" market, as the case might be—I am not sure just where to draw the line at times—of raising the interest rate up to 10, 15, or 20 per cent on call loans, and as high as 30 per cent has recently been charged. When that happens the commercial rates of interest rise all over the country, and commercial rates are now running from 8 to 9 per cent, which makes a tax directly upon the cost of living—there is no question about that—and has the effect, because Government bonds are bearing a low rate of interest, under 5 per cent, of "bearing" the value of such bonds. So the people who bought those bonds for patriotic purposes, amounting to $26,000,000,000, have suffered a loss in the depreciation of $1,750,000,000. That is the approximate loss on those bonds of the Government.

When the Treasury induces the people to buy these bonds at par it ought not to then establish a policy or permit policies of others that would lower the value of such bonds. To buy these bonds at below par by the War Finance Corporation I do not approve. It would be better to buy at par, and, better, to have the reserve banks limit loans and give lower interest on loans made.

My opinion is that the true way to stop speculation in stocks is to raise the margin and to refuse loans for such purposes. It is entirely within the discretion of the banks to refuse a loan for speculative purposes in investment securities. There was recently employed in the New York banks $1,900,000,000 in speculative investments alone.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina rose.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator from South Carolina desire to interrupt me?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point I was making was not particularly in reference to the speculative feature which is complained of which exists in New York in connection with call money and time loans, but the Government at its own banks, so to speak, is charging a higher rate of discount than the interest which is allowed, so that a bank which has taken these liabilities of the Government and goes to the Federal reserve banks in order to realize a loan on them has to suffer a loss of three-fourths of 1 per cent; that is, the 4¼ per cent bond is being discounted now at 5 per cent. So the banks are now getting rid of such bonds as rapidly as possible.

Mr. OWEN. I think the purpose of the Federal Reserve Board is to cause the Federal reserve banks to bring some pressure on the banks for the purpose of getting them to dispose of these bonds to private holders, so as to take them out of the banks as active collateral and use such credits more largely for commercial purposes. It is much more difficult for the banks to dispose of these bonds when they are at a 10 per cent discount than if they were on a rising scale instead of on a falling scale. If the Government enters upon a new expansion of loans the Government may have to pay 6 per cent for money if the present situation continues. It is perfectly easy for the Federal Reserve Board to lower its rate of interest, and when the Federal Reserve Board is establishing a rate of interest to be charged a member bank for a loan of part of its own reserve that member bank ought to have that accommodation for 3 to 4 per cent, and a low standard of interest ought to be fixed in order to bring those bonds back to par, where they belong.

Mr. President, I wish to make the observation that the high rate on call loans could easily be checked if there were a system of biweekly settlements such as obtains in London. In that case there would be no call loans, and there would not be the fluctuations from day to day, but the rate would have to be fixed for approximately two weeks, and in that way our present difficulty could be avoided, and there would be no call loans as such. The old necessity for call loans, which arose at the period of time when the banks of the United States had no other way in which to get cash except by call loans, under which they could get it quickly in case of necessity, has passed away; the need for the call-loan system has disappeared with the development of the Federal reserve act. I call attention to that because I think Senators should realize that the necessity for that sort of thing no longer exists, and it has a very injurious effect upon the stock market in breaking the market down.

There is another matter of vital importance to the country, and to which I invite the attention of Senators, namely, that the railroads of this country are going to require somewhere in the neighborhood of five or ten billion dollars of new credit to put them in condition. How are they going to get this money if they are obliged to pay the very high current rates? They can not get it on a fair basis, and if they do not get it on a fair basis it will reflect itself in high freight rates, in high passenger rates, and in higher cost of living.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for taking a minute or two of the time of the Senate, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the situation with reference to the question of rates and discounts by Federal reserve banks. I am not usually in the habit of saying, "I told you so," but when the most important legislation concerning this matter was pending before the Senate, when we were engaged in a tremendous war, and when some who believed that we still lived in the United States of America asserted that a mistake was being made in the legislation proposed, no attention was paid to our warning. We know what the newspapers throughout the country then stated. It develops now, however, that the mistake was made at that time, and we can not get away from it. It is to that only that I desire now to call the attention of Senators.

We know now, as a matter of fact, that more than 23,000 millionaires have been made during the recent war. Those of us who at that time said that the only thing to do was to increase the taxes and to make those people pay the expenses for carrying on the war are now being vindicated. The millions of people who bought Liberty bonds for a patriotic purpose, as stated by the two Senators who have preceded me, are now experiencing exactly what was called to the attention of the Senate at that time. The man on the farm who mortgaged his last cow in order to purchase a Liberty bond has to sell it now. You admit that now; we said so then. The only preventive for this situation was at that time to increase the rate of taxation; but you refused to do so.

I am only reminding you of the fact that for directing attention to the practice which was inaugurated through the revenue bill and merely for calling attention to what would happen in the future some of us at times were characterized as disloyal. No man but a novice would have expected anything else to follow. The millions of people who are now holding Liberty bonds will ultimately need cash and they will be glad to discount their Liberty bonds at whatever rate may be offered. So what is the use of quarreling about it? We know that the Liberty bonds will drift into the hands of the money speculators and profiteers. There were some of us who knew it at the time the legislation was enacted, and other Senators acknowledge now that it is true. They acknowledge that what we then predicted is actually happening. We are still in the United States of America; our form of government, thank God, has not changed; but at that time you permitted at least 23,000 men to become millionaires. There were about 7,000 of them before, and we now have about 30,000 millionaires, 23,000 of whom were made during the recent war.

There were, I repeat, a few of us who wanted to impose a tax of at least 80 per cent upon excess profits at that time, but a majority of the Senate refused to take such action. I am simply calling attention to that fact and to remind Senators that they can not expect now that these men who have the money will be willing to accept our Liberty bonds, although they are an obligation of the Government of the United States, without making further profit.

Mr. OWEN. "Our" Liberty bonds.

Mr. GRONNA. I mean "our" Liberty bonds, because I am one of the subscribers to the Liberty bonds; I am paying my share; but if the result of what has happened did not fall any more heavily upon anyone than upon myself I should not even complain this morning. I know, however, that the girl or the boy working in the shop and in the factory who paid 100 cents on the dollar for Liberty bonds—one or two or three of them, perhaps—will ultimately have to dispose of them at a discount. That is unfair to them; but, my friends, the mistake was made at the time we enacted the revenue law.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator's opinion as to the rate of 30 per cent on loans in New York.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, that is indefensible, I will say to the Senator, and I agree with him that whatever is done in New York, that being our largest city, is reflected throughout the entire country. I also entirely agree with the Senator that, so far as the unlimited discounts are concerned which are being permitted to be made in any place in the United States, I do not approve of them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the present market value of Liberty bonds can, I think, be very easily explained. It is not due to the need of certain holders of limited means for ready cash, although that may have some influence in the equation. The Saturday Evening Post of last week contained a very illuminating article on the subject—at least it was illuminating to me. Speculative dealers in questionable securities issued by questionable enterprises, false pretenders, and swindlers throughout the country have been able to reap a rich harvest from the average holders of Liberty bonds by appealing to their cupidity and holding out promises of enormous returns to be realized upon their own enterprises. As a result many millions, perhaps billions, of dollars of Liberty bonds have been surrendered by the holders in exchange for stocks and securities which are practically worthless, and the new holders of these bonds have converted them into cash and used them for loans. The fall in the value of the bonds is, therefore, inevitable, for the market is glutted with them. That has occurred irrespective of our system of taxation. It is simply the operation of natural laws upon conditions which are scandalous, but which nevertheless exist, and for which the Government is blameless.

While I am on my feet I wish to direct attention, however, to one phase of the discount requirements of the Federal Reserve Board which, in my judgment, is subject to very serious criticism.

The 4¼ per cent loan certificates, in which banks and individuals have invested to enable the Government to continue to meet its usual expenditures, and the 4¼ per cent Liberty bonds, were purchased, as I am assured, upon the express assurance of the Government that the discount rate would not be raised above the interest-bearing covenant of the bonds and certificates. I know of one bank which invested $10,000,000 in these certificates of indebtedness upon this assurance, but to-day the discount rate in that reserve division is 5 per cent for both sets of securities, and that, if my information is correct, involves a breach of faith by the Government with their holders.

I, of course, am aware of the necessity of raising discount rates if any limitation is to be placed upon the already undue expansion of credit; but unless the Government keeps faith with those who invest their money with it upon the strength of its assurances it will not be surprising if confidence be shaken in prevailing methods of banking.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I just want to call attention to the logical result of this situation of discounting at a higher rate than the obligation bears.

As the Senator from Colorado says, those who are compelled to liquidate or realize upon these bonds, finding that the rate of discount is greater than the rate of interest they receive, and needing the money, are going to dispose of the bonds, because every time one pays a higher rate of interest than the instrument bears that is a discount on the paper itself. The result inevitably is that those bonds that are held by individuals of limited means will find a market, while those who have unlimited means, knowing that the Government will redeem its promise and pay the interest will hold their bonds. The result is, inevitably, a constant pressure to force the bonds out of weak hands into strong hands, and ultimately to cause them to drift into the pockets of those who are able to hold the bonds without realizing upon them.

I was not aware of the fact stated by the Senator that there was an understanding between the Government and the purchasers that the rate of discount should not exceed the rate of interest borne by the bonds. Nothing will go so far to stabilize the price of the bonds and to hold them in the hands of the individuals who now own them as having it understood that the rate of discount when they are hypothecated for a loan shall not exceed the rate of interest that they bear.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss this question, but I simply wish to say that it is not altogether the person who holds one bond that is selling these bonds. The banks of the country have been forced to sell them, and the largest purchaser of the bonds is the United States itself. I want to say that the United States is buying these bonds at a discount to-day, and it is buying them just as low as it can possibly get them, and I am not stating this by way of complaint.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, just before the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] made his assault upon the present revenue law I was called out of the Chamber, and have just returned.

Without entering into any controversy with the Senator, I want to say that his attack upon the revenue legislation of the Congress is, in my judgment, wholly unwarranted. It was not the revenue legislation that made the large number of millionaires to which he refers. The increase in the number of millionaires as the result of the war has been considerable, but when the war started we had quite an army of millionaires in this country. The number that have been added to the list as the result of the war probably is not more than the number of millionaires created out of the Civil War. The Civil War started without any millionaires in this country and ended with a great many millionaires, and wars have generally resulted in the creation of millionaires, here and everywhere else.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I am sure that upon reflection the Senator will not make that statement, because it was reported that we had only about 7,000 millionaires in this country before the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, that was a very great underestimate. It was reported from some sources that we had many more than that. From other sources there was a disposition to minimize the number, and they probably worked it down to 7,000; but that is immaterial.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, does not the Senator know that the reports show that we have 30,000 millionaires in this country now?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not know that, and I do not think that is true; but the point I am making is this: Relatively speaking—and when I say "relatively speaking," I speak with reference to the wealth of this country at the time of the Civil War and at the time of the great World War—relatively speaking, the number of millionaires that were added to the list as a direct result of the World War was not greater than those that were added to the list as the result of the Civil War. But, Mr. President, that is not the gravamen of the Senator's charge. The Senator charges that if he and a handful of gentlemen who cooperated with him in an effort to about double the taxes that were to be imposed upon the people of this country for war purposes had succeeded we would not have had these millionaires, and we would not have had the great debt that we now have. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the debt that we now have is only about one-half the sum that it was estimated by the Senator and some of his colleagues in their fight against the war-revenue bill as the probable size of our public indebtedness.

Mr. GRONNA. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that when the second revenue act was passed the President of the United States himself recommended an increase in the rates.

Mr. SIMMONS. There might have been some recommendation of that sort on the excess-profits tax. There might have been some recommendation upon the income tax.

Mr. GRONNA. I know the Senator does not wish to misquote me intentionally. The Senator is mistaken when he says that I said we would not have so many millionaires. I do not know how many millionaires we are going to have, because these men have made not only one million, but several; but I do say we would not have had so many debts and so many bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and before the war commenced, Mr. President, from other causes chiefly growing out of legislation we had not only millionaires but multimillionaires and billionaires in this country.

Mr. President, it was estimated by those gentlemen when we were passing that revenue bill that unless we increased the rate of taxation to the extent that they demanded, which was nearly double what we placed upon a part of the industries of this country, we would have a debt of from fifty to sixty billions of dollars at the close of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator ought also to call the attention of the American people to the fact that the taxes imposed upon America on account of the war were higher than the taxes imposed upon any other country in the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will get to that. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, if we had imposed the high rate of taxes that was demanded by two or three here in the Senate at the time the first revenue bill was under discussion, the industries of this country would have been so handicapped by that rate of taxation that they would not have been able to have functioned in the splendid and magnificent way that they did, and that made it possible for us to win the war. As the Senator from Utah has stated, we imposed upon the wealth of this country a higher rate of taxation than any country in the world has ever placed in time of war upon its wealth.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator is aware of the fact that every dollar of this enormous tax that could be was passed right on to the consumer, and instead of laying a tax upon wealth in its ultimate analysis it rests upon the producers of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that the consumers have caught it, and they always do catch it. You can not levy any tax in this country without the consumer catching it. But if we had doubled the tax, as the Senator says we ought to have done, and the consumer has caught what we did levy, the consumers would have gotten twice as heavy a burden as they have had to bear.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it was argued by the Senator himself that some of the people would be taxed as high as 60 per cent under the first bill, was it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think some of them were, and more than that.

Mr. GRONNA. It is hardly fair to say that I advocated doubling the taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Some Senator on the other side, following the Senator from North Dakota and his special friend, did propose here one day to impose a tax that was more than 100 per cent.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall show from the RECORD that there were not only two or three with me for increasing the rate of taxation, but I want the RECORD to show the votes, and the Senator will find that there was a very large number above three who were in favor of increasing the tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will increase the number to five, then, if three does not satisfy the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator will find that there were more than that number.

Mr. SIMMONS. There were not many more than five. Mr. President, the only point I wish to make is that the tax which we levied was higher than that levied by any other nation on the face of the earth, even in times of war; and the great bulk of that taxation was primarily placed upon the productive wealth of this country. Practically every dollar of the excess-profits tax fell upon the productive industries of the country. The surtax which we imposed in the income-tax bill was a tax which reached not the poor, not the man of moderate means, not the well to do, but reached the wealth of the country, and I will say to the Senator that a large part of that was imposed in a form which made it impossible to pass it to the consumer.

I want to say to the Senator right now that if we had not levied the tax we did, but had followed him, the Government would have broken down in its finances, in my judgment, because it would have imposed such a burden upon the industries of the country as would have crippled them, and made it impossible for them to respond as readily and as effectively as they did to the demands of the Government.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator is making a statement which is not warranted by the facts. I can call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to some of the ablest financiers, who have criticized the revenue act. He need not take my statement for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Mr. President, I have no doubt that the ablest financiers have done it, because the clients of the ablest financiers were the people who were mulcted by the system of taxation. I want to say right now, that, in my judgment, no other country in the world ever solved the great problem of financing the greatest war in history by the greatest and wealthiest country in the world as it was solved by the finance measure which we passed here with practically the assent of both sides of this Chamber.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a moment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina made some statements which I do not believe are warranted by the facts or can be sustained from the records. He referred to my "special friend." I suppose he referred to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who, on September 3, offered an amendment providing for a 70 per cent tax on war profits. There were 20 Senators who voted for that amendment, and, without reading, I ask that the names of those 20 Senators be inserted in the RECORD.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] kindly yielded to me for just a moment. I can not make the reply to the Senator from North Carolina which I would make, and which I shall make in the near future. I shall give him an opportunity to demonstrate and to go into detail, and I invite him now to prepare his data, but to prepare it from the records and not from memory.

Mr. President, I ask that these votes be printed in the RECORD, showing the number of votes cast for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, and that the amendment also be printed.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Page ——, No. 1368. Date, September 3, 1917. Proposed by LA FOLLETTE. Amendment to committee amendment to bill H. R. 4280, revenue bill for war expenses, for 70 per cent tax on war profits.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment reported by the committee it is proposed to strike out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "70 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

RECLASSIFICATION COMMISSION.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, reported out a resolution this morning for the continuation of certain work of the Reclassification Commission after the commission shall have rendered its report. I would like to ask that that resolution may be taken up for consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects. The morning business is closed. [At 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.]

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a moment.

INTEREST ON COLLATERAL CALL LOANS.

Mr. OWEN. I ask leave to offer a resolution, which is a resolution of inquiry from the Federal Reserve Board.

The resolution (S. Res. 328) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be, and is hereby, directed to advise the Senate what is the cause and justification for the usurious rates of interest on collateral call loans in the financial centers, under what law authorized, and what steps, if any, are required to abate this condition.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. GORE. I desire to give notice of my intention to offer the reservation which I send to the desk to the pending resolution of ratification. I ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed reservation for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

The United States understands that no mandatory power shall, without the consent of the council, enjoy any monopoly, privilege, or preference in respect of the natural resources or the acquisition, development, and operation of the same in any territory placed under its control, influence, or mandate; and the United States further understands that no member of the league shall, without the consent of the council, enjoy any monopoly, privilege, or preference prejudicial to the equal rights and opportunities of any other member in respect of the natural resources or the acquisition, development, or operation of the same situate in any colony, dependency, or sphere of influence, its title or claim to which shall have been vested or confirmed by the treaty or by virtue of the action or authority of the league itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed reservation will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it was manifest on Saturday that the Senate is very anxious to proceed as rapidly as possible with the remaining reservations so as to reach reservation No. 2, affecting article 10. I ask unanimous consent that on all the remaining reservations except the reservation No. 2, relating to article 10, each Senator be limited to 20 minutes' debate on each reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that on all remaining reservations except reservation 2, relating to article 10, each Senator shall be limited to 20 minutes' debate on each reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to say that I think that is too strict a limitation on reservation 14. That is a serious matter, and I should like to have it excepted from the request.

Mr. LODGE. If I can get an agreement by making an exception of reservation 14 I am ready to do so. I should like to get the agreement I have proposed as to the rest of the reservations.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the unanimous-consent agreement as presented intended to include all new reservations which may be offered?

Mr. LODGE. No; only the remaining reservations, prior to reaching reservation No. 14 and reservation No. 2, which covers article 10.

Mr. THOMAS. Including amendments to the reservations?

Mr. LODGE. It includes everything.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is to say, 20 minutes are allowed on an amendment?

Mr. LODGE. No; 20 minutes on each reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. I do not understand that the unanimous consent is intended to apply to the question on the adoption of the resolution of ratification itself?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; that comes after we get into the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the unanimous-consent agreement be again read, as I entered the Chamber after it was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the proposed agreement.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

That on all remaining reservations, except reservations 2 and 14, each Senator shall be limited to 20 minutes' debate on each reservation.

Mr. REED. As drawn, it would include reservations which might hereafter be offered.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is not so intended. It says "the remaining reservations."

Mr. REED. Suppose, so that there will be no misunderstanding, we make it read, "the so-called Lodge reservations."

Mr. LODGE. We might say "the remaining pending reservations," but they are not pending. There is only one pending at a time. That does not cover it.

Mr. REED. Why not name them, and then there would be no doubt?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They could be stated as "the committee reservations."

Mr. LODGE. They are committee reservations. Let it read "the remaining Foreign Relations Committee reservations, except reservation 2 and reservation 14."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to correct the Assistant Secretary that it is not article 14, but reservation No. 14. Exception is made in favor of reservation No. 2 and reservation No. 14.

Mr. LODGE. That is the way it is worded.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think he read "article 14."

Mr. LODGE. I do not think he could have read "article 14."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have it reread.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read again.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As originally presented it read:

That on all remaining reservations, except the reservation to article 10, each Senator shall be limited to 20 minutes' debate on each reservation.

As now amended it reads:

That on all remaining Foreign Relations Committee reservations, except the reservation to article 10 and reservation No. 14, each Senator shall be limited to 20 minutes' debate on each reservation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "And amendments thereto," I would suggest. As it stands, anybody can offer substitutes and amendments forever.

Mr. LODGE. No; we are still speaking about the reservations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think if a Senator offered a substitute for it——

Mr. LODGE. Let it read "reservations and amendments thereto," if desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is unanimously entered into.

The unanimous-consent agreement is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on all remaining Foreign Relations Committee reservations, except the reservation to article 10 and reservation No. 14, each Senator shall be limited to 20 minutes' debate on each reservation and amendments thereto.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he could not extend his request to a final vote on the reservation to article 10 this week?

Mr. LODGE. I can not do so, because there is objection to putting a limitation on reservation 14 and reservation 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] to reservation No. 9.

Mr. LODGE. An amendment was offered to it by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment was proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], sent to the desk, but not formally offered.

Mr. MCCORMICK. It was sent to the desk, read, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That being true, the question is upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW].

Mr. MCCORMICK. I offer the amendment to the substitute as proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed now by the Senator from Illinois.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana, after the word "Congress," in that substitute, the following:

And the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Mr. NEW. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to my substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana accepts the amendment and modifies his amendment accordingly. The question now is upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana as modified.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. DILLINGHAM's name was called). The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is necessarily absent to-day. If present, he would vote "yea." He has a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I agreed to take care of him by a pair during his absence. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], which I do, and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and on this question I vote "nay." I ask that the announcement of my pair and its transfer may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote upon this amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness, to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. He is paired by a transfer on this vote with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. If present, the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber and voted in the affirmative.

Mr. GRONNA. A moment ago I made the statement that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] having now voted, I withdraw that announcement and merely state that if present the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on this question would vote "yea."

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to announce that on this question I am paired. If I had not been paired I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 27, as follows:

So Mr. NEW's substitute for reservation No. 10 was agreed to, as follows:

No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the reservation as amended.

Mr. LODGE. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the question, as I understand, now recurs upon the reservation as amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the situation in which it finds itself by the action just taken. The reservation under consideration originally read as follows:

10. If the United States shall at any time adopt any plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

The important point being that after the plan is proposed by the council, and after the plan is adopted and approved by the United States, then, under this, the United States reserves the right to increase its armament in time of war or when threatened with war or invasion, the plan to the contrary notwithstanding. That was the question over which the discussion arose, as to whether the right should be reserved by the United States to increase its armament after it had adopted a plan which presumably did not give it that right. It was argued that if the United States desired to exercise that right it would not approve the plan, and when the plan came before Congress it would reject it if it did not so provide. But, Mr. President, see what we have done. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] moved as a substitute for that the reservation as it had been tentatively agreed upon by the bipartisan conference, as follows:

No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress.

It will be observed that that leaves out the provision under which the United States, after it had agreed to the plan recommended by the council, could then increase its armament, and yet, marvelous to relate, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] proposes to add to that draft of the reservation the very matter which it was intended by the substitute to exclude, namely, the language—

It reserves the right to increase such armaments without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

So after all this learned discussion we have got back to the very point from which we started. Now, I submit, is not that absurd? Of course if that proposition is to be embraced by the Senate as expressive of its ideas, let the Lodge resolution alone, reject the substitute, and vote upon the original Lodge resolution. We put ourselves in a perfectly ridiculous attitude by this sort of procedure.

I really think that some Senator who voted for the substitute of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] as amended by the McCormick amendment ought to arise and move to reconsider or that it ought by unanimous consent to be reconsidered, and we ought to vote upon the original Lodge reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the subject of the vote is determined by the parliamentary situation. It is on the reservation as amended, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I inquire whether a motion at this time to reconsider the vote by which the New substitute as amended by the McCormick amendment was adopted would be in order?

Mr. LODGE. It would be, if made by some Senator who voted on the prevailing side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that a motion to reconsider would be in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust some Senator will make the motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to reconsider the vote just taken in order that a vote may be had on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] to the substitute reservation.

Mr. LODGE. I move to lay the motion upon the table, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON]. On that motion the Senator from Massachusetts asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and its transfer to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY]. I desire this announcement to stand for all votes to-day. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Reiterating the explanation made upon the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 32, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to reservation No. 10 as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

So reservation No. 10 as amended was agreed to, as follows:

No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to reservation No. 11, and I move to amend it, in line 7, by striking out the words "that violating said article 16" and inserting "such covenant-breaking State."

That is to correct an error in the original reservation. The insertion of the words "that violating said article 16" was a misprint, which the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] tried to correct on the 19th of November, but objection was made at that stage to anything, and therefore it was not accomplished. This is simply to correct that error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the reservation stated as it would then read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to state the question, and the reservation as proposed to be amended shall then be stated. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In line 7 of the reservation it is proposed to strike out the words "that violating said article 16" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "such covenant-breaking State," so that if amended the reservation will read:

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator a question. The amendment which he is now offering is different from the one which he proposed to offer, as found upon this printed copy?

Mr. LODGE. It is. I do not propose to offer that. It was never agreed upon—neither that nor the one to the first reservation. I offered the one to the first reservation as an experiment, and the Senator and his friends voted it down; and I am not going to offer this one, to which I object, and which is a substantial change.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any desire to quibble with the Senator. I do not care how bad he makes his reservations. They are easier to vote against on that account. I only wanted to get the matter clarified. He has put upon our desks a printed copy of what he proposes to offer, but he is now offering something different.

Mr. LODGE. I am. I withdrew that, and offered another, which I believe is parliamentary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 11. Those in favor of the amendment will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.] The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. So there are some who vote against correcting a typographical error!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on reservation No. 11, as amended.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. DILLINGHAM'S name was called). The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is obliged to be absent to-day. If present, he would vote "yea." He has a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that that announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Making the same explanation, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 28, as follows:

So reservation No. 11, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, was agreed to, as follows:

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I move now the adoption of reservation No. 12.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I understand that reservation No. 12 originated with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I have never been able to get any information from any source whatever which gives me any idea as to the operation of that reservation or who it is the reservation is intended to take care of or the character of cases it is intended to take care of. I should like to have from the Senator from New York, if he can give us an illustration, some concrete case to which the reservation would be applicable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not certain that I can give a concrete case. My attention was called to the language of the annex to article 297 of the treaty itself, which will be found upon page 137 of the printed copy of the treaty which I have in my hand. Article 297 of the treaty itself has to do with the property rights and interests of citizens of the belligerent nations, property rights and interests of enemy aliens generally, and the settlement of those interests under the treaty.

The annex to which I have referred reads in part as follows:

In accordance with the provisions of article 297, paragraph (d), the validity of vesting orders and of orders for the winding up of businesses or companies, and of any other orders, directions, decisions, or instructions of any court or any department of the Government of any of the high contracting parties made or given, or purporting to be made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights, and interests is confirmed. The interests of all persons shall be regarded as having been effectively dealt with by any order, direction, decision, or instruction dealing with property in which they may be interested.

The term "all persons" is infinitely more comprehensive than the term "enemy aliens," and if construed as the English language is ordinarily construed, in this connection it would include American citizens as well as enemy aliens who happen to have resided in the United States during the war and whose property was dealt with by our Government.

The object of this reservation is to see to it that in the event of American citizens having had rights or interests in property which has been dealt with by our Government as owned in whole or in part by enemy alien interests they shall have their right hereafter to appeal to the courts of the United States and not be debarred from such an appeal by the language of this annex, which otherwise, if no reservation is adopted, confirms everything that was done and closes the door against all persons. The reservation is interpretative in that respect. I think myself that the meaning of the phrase "all persons" would include, of course, citizens of the United States. I do not believe there was a real intention to do it, but as the annex reads it does do it. I can see no objection whatever to an interpretative reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. WADSWORTH. From page 137 of the printed copy of the treaty. It is the annex to article 297. I have not read it all. It goes further and is even stronger.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What paragraph of the annex?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Paragraph 1. It goes further and says:

No question shall be raised as to the regularity of a transfer of any property rights or interests dealt with in pursuance of any such order, direction, decision, or instruction.

And all persons are involved.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not able to follow the Senator, because I have not been able to turn to it, but the Senator has not given us any concrete case at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I said at the beginning that I was not aware of a concrete case. An opinion has been expressed by lawyers in whom I have confidence that cases may arise in the future that would fall within the provisions of this annex and involve the rights of American citizens. I think it is almost certain that such an event will arise, for it must be remembered that our Government dealt with something like three-quarters of a billion or a billion dollars worth of property—I forget the exact figures—which was enemy alien property, and it is almost certain that some American citizens had some rights or property interests in that property as minority stockholders or had some contracts with concerns that were taken over.

This reservation makes no reflection upon our Government whatsoever, but simply attempts to secure to American citizens the rights they would ordinarily have at any time. They would not be debarred from pressing their rights as the result of the ratification of the treaty with this annex.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it strikes me as something marvelous in the extreme that the Senate of the United States should be incorporating a reservation in the resolution of ratification of a treaty when no one is able to give a plain and concise statement of any existing state of facts to which the provision would be applicable, nor even to suppose a state of facts to which the provision would be applicable.

I am merely guessing about it, but I guess that this reservation means this: The Alien Property Custodian took into his possession property which he estimated and which he considered to be of the value of something like three-quarters of a billion dollars, as suggested by the Senator from New York. The owners of that property contend that it is worth three or four times, perhaps ten times, that amount; at least, it is not at all improbable that if they had an opportunity to present claims for it they would assert claims for somewhere between $5,000,000,000 and $10,000,000,000.

It is perfectly well known that in the case of a large amount of that property the stock, which really belonged to alien enemies, was put in the names of American citizens. That fact has been disclosed in hearings before committees of the Senate, and it is a matter of public notoriety. These individuals set up the claim that the stock belonged to them individually as against the contention of the Government that it was really held in trust for alien enemies, and I take it that this provision, which we are now to endeavor to make a part of the resolution of ratification of this treaty, is to take care of the interests of those American citizens who claim to have held this stock in their own right, as against the contention of the Government that they were mere dummies holding it for foreign and alien enemy interests.

Of course, it is broad enough to take care of their rights, as well as of the rights of the man who in good faith, and honestly, asserted a right as an American citizen in property taken over by the Alien Property Custodian. But the real claimant, the man who is complaining about it, in about 90 per cent of the cases, at least, I dare say will be found to be a mere colorable holder for the enemy alien.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, Mr. President, it would be a matter of no consequence if his claim were asserted in perfect good faith, and if he actually owned it in his own right, and he was an American citizen. There is nothing in the treaty that can possibly affect his rights in any way, shape, or manner, and there is not a lawyer upon this floor, I undertake to say, who will assert that his rights could be affected in any way, shape, or manner.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield first, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as he rose first.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that there might be some honest claimants. The Senator would not object to giving them their day in court?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly not. You can not take their day in court away from them, and that is the point I am making. The Constitution of the United States takes care of them by providing that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law.

Mr. REED. When I rose the Senator had not reached that point. I am inclined to think that the Senator would be found to be right on the last proposition, and I am inclined to concur with him. In view of the fact that there are honest claimants, or may be honest claimants as well as dishonest claimants, what is the objection to giving them all a day in our courts and saying so plainly in this instance, so that that question will not have to be fought over as a preliminary to a court proceeding?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We do not need it here at all because it is already taken care of. It is taken care of in a better way than the treaty can take care of it. It is taken care of by the Constitution of the United States. Whether a man is honest or dishonest in his claim, if he is an American citizen you can not take away from him the right to have a court adjudicate whether he is entitled to property or not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Then this just leaves it where our Constitution leaves it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I feel that I should yield to the Senator from Massachusetts if he desires to interrogate me.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wanted to say that I can not see that it would do any possible harm to reserve this privilege to American citizens. If they have it already, they will go into courts. I have confidence in the courts of the United States, and it does not trouble me that we are protecting the rights of American citizens even if we are overprotecting them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield now to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator if the paragraph at the end of the annex, in the last sentence, does not take care of the matter just as well as the reservation proposed by the Senator from New York. The proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not be held to prejudice the titles to property heretofore acquired in good faith and for value and in accordance with the laws of the country in which the property is situated by nationals of the allied and associated powers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say that it does.

Mr. LODGE. But that does not get by the "any person." The "any person" is the point. "Any person" is every person.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. "Their nationals" will be nationals of the allied and associated powers. There are no other persons except enemy aliens and neutrals, and those apparently are the ones to be taken care of.

Mr. LODGE. This reservation gives no protection to enemy aliens, and the Senator is well aware of that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not quite so sure about it.

Mr. LODGE. This provides for American citizens. An enemy alien is not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In any case, in view of the provision to which our attention is called by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], it can only protect neutrals, not citizens of the United States or citizens of any of our allies, because they are already protected by the very article to which the reservation is directed. If that is not the situation——

Mr. LODGE. It can not protect anybody but citizens of the United States who are named in it. It does not protect neutrals.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from New York can shed any more light on it, and if I have not stated the case as it is, I should be very glad to be advised about it, because I am groping in the dark about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This matter was the subject of some discussion in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the discussion was printed as a part of the hearings. I was not present at the time, not being a member of that committee, but it was suggested that the language of this paragraph of annex 1 of article 297 was ambiguous, and grave doubt was expressed by some members of the Committee on Foreign Relations as to whether the use of the words "all persons" would not include citizens of the United States. This reservation is simply to make it clear.

Mr. LODGE. That is all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not protect neutrals, neutrals are not mentioned in it; it does not protect enemy aliens, enemy aliens are not mentioned in it. It says rights of citizens of the United States, and that is all. What objection there can be to it passes my comprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on reservation No. 12, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I can see no real objection to the reservation except that in the instance cited by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] American citizens, having had shares of stock or property transferred to them nominally, might be used to protect alien enemies. That is the only question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But our courts can be trusted to decide things of that sort and to make a decision justly.

Mr. FLETCHER. It may be very difficult to uncover a fraud of that kind. I do not know of any such instances, but there is a possibility that there might be some collusion there.

Mr. LODGE. I think the courts are quite as likely to uncover it and reach a just verdict as is the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to suggest to the Senator that if the treaty does cut off the claim of an American citizen who claims that he is a stockholder, but may not be, it would also cut off claims of all other good-faith American citizens. If it did in the one case it would in the other.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not question that, but I quite agree with the Senator from Montana that every right of every citizen of the United States is protected by the Constitution of the United States, and the proviso at the end of the paragraph, it seems to me, fully settles that.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield there? Under the proviso it will be necessary for a claimant to show that he acquired the property for value. Does the Senator think that an American citizen, with no German rights involved, in order to substantiate his claim to his own property, must prove that he acquired it for value? He might have secured it by gift.

Mr. FLETCHER. In accordance with the laws of the country or in good faith.

Mr. LENROOT. And for value.

Mr. LODGE. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the reservation.

Mr. GERRY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harris	McLean	Smith, Md.
Capper	Harrison	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Henderson	New	Smoot
Colt	Hitchcock	Norris	Spencer
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Dial	Kellogg	Page	Thomas
Elkins	Kendrick	Phelan	Trammell
Fletcher	Kenyon	Phipps	Wadsworth
Gay	Keyes	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	Kirby	Reed	Watson
Glass	Knox	Sheppard	Williams
Gore	Lodge	Sherman	Wolcott
Hale	McKellar	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The yeas and nays have been requested on agreeing to the reservation.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of sickness. I have been unable to secure a transfer of that pair, and therefore must withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. As I am unable to secure a pair for him, I simply wish to announce that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I have not seen him present at this vote. Therefore I transfer my pair with him to my colleague [Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HARRIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Shields
Brandegee	Gore	McLean	Smoot
Capper	Gronna	McNary	Spencer
Chamberlain	Hale	Moses	Sterling
Colt	Henderson	Myers	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Wadsworth
Edge	Kenyon	Phipps	Warren
Elkins	Keyes	Poindexter	Watson
Fernald	Knox	Pomerene
Fletcher	Lenroot	Reed
France	Lodge	Sherman

NAYS—27.

Culberson	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Dial	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Gay	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Trammell
Gerry	Kendrick	Phelan	Walsh, Mont.
Glass	King	Pittman	Wolcott
Harris	Kirby	Sheppard

NOT VOTING—23.

Ashurst	Johnson, Calif.	Penrose	Swanson
Borah	La Follette	Ransdell	Thomas
Calder	McCumber	Robinson	Underwood
Dillingham	New	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh, Mass.
Fall	Newberry	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Harding	Overman	Stanley

So reservation No. 12, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, was agreed to, as follows:

12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now move the adoption of reservation No. 13. There has been no amendment proposed to that reservation.

Mr. KING. Let the reservation be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reservation will be stated.

The reservation reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was read, as follows:

13. The United States withholds its assent to part 13 (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said part 13, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the reservation.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same statement as heretofore regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair if present would vote in the affirmative upon this reservation. I am, therefore, at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to repeat the announcement that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. Making the same announcement regarding my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer the general pair which I have with the junior Senator from Montana to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GRONNA. In view of the announcement of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], I simply wish to state that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] stands paired by transfer with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). My general pair, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], is still absent, but on this question I am sure that he and I would vote alike. Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who, I understand, has not voted. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Reed
Borah	Gore	McLean	Sherman
Brandegee	Gronna	McNary	Shields

So reservation No. 13 was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now move to take up reservation No. 14, and to that I move an amendment which is printed on the slip, inserting at the beginning the lines in italics from 1 to 6 down to the words "United States." I will ask the Secretary to read it as it would stand as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "The," the first word, and insert:

Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, shall be entitled to cast, the—

Then, after the word "the," in line 6, the following words intervene:

United States assumes no obligation to be bound—

Then, after the word "bound," in line 7, it is proposed to insert:

Except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent—

And, at the top of page 2, it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert "The United States," so that, if amended, the reservation will read:

Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, have cast more than one vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 14.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not know whether the purpose of the amendment is to make the reservation more reasonable or whether it is merely to camouflage the situation for the purpose of indicating to the nations which we propose to disfranchise that we are doing it for a legitimate purpose.

The original reservation is nothing more nor less than a notice on the part of the United States that we object to having the self-governing dominions and colonies of the British Empire represented in the assembly. It is an attempt on our part to deny to those countries, which are practically independent nations, the right to a voice in international affairs.

Take, for instance, Canada, to the north of us. We practically say to Canada in this reservation, "We object to your being represented as a separate nation in the assembly of nations. We consent to all the little republics of the world being represented; we consent to each one of those little nations having a voice in the assembly; but we object to Canada, our neighbor on the north, being represented at all."

In other words, Mr. President, we are confronted with this situation: For years, as we know, there has been a steady purpose followed by the great colonies of the British Empire toward independence. Year by year they have taken over more of the powers of self-government, until to-day practically the only difference between Canada and an independent nation is that Great Britain, in the diplomacy of the world, represents Canada, and if the United States desires to negotiate a matter through diplomatic channels with Canada, we are supposed to take it up through the diplomatic representatives of the British Empire.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. In view of the statement of the Senator, which is entirely sound, as I understand it, I should like to ask him a question.

The constitution of Canada is an act of Parliament, and its Government has only such powers as are given it by that act of Parliament. All of its foreign relations are conducted entirely through the British Imperial Government, the control of foreign relations being one of the prerogatives of the British Crown. Now, this treaty was signed more than a year ago. I wish to know, Has Great Britain within that time changed the constitutions of its self-governing colonies so as to allow them any control over their foreign relations? Has it taken any steps to execute this treaty, or has it still retained this power over the foreign relations of its colonies, which it always has had, and doubtless always will exercise?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not much interested in knowing what progress has been made toward granting the demands of Canada and New Zealand and Australia and South Africa for an independent international status. I know very well, however, that the people of those dominions—largely Anglo-Saxons like ourselves—have set their hearts upon that independent representation, and that they propose, as the result of this war, to secure that representation. I understand that Canada is also taking steps for representation with the United States and with other important nations of the world upon an independent basis; but I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that in the face of this determined demand which was made at Paris by Canada and Australia and New Zealand and South Africa, in the United States, instead of lending encouragement to that determined effort to obtain diplomatic independence, the Senate of the United States proposes to slam the door of opportunity in the faces of these people, our neighbors here to the north.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I will ask if the Senator does not think that the authority to control the foreign relations of these self-governing colonies should come from the mother country, the Imperial Government, rather than the United States; and would it not be a very unfriendly act for the United States to be interfering in the affairs of the British Government and encouraging its colonies to exercise powers which the Imperial Government has never granted them, and which they can not exercise without an act of Parliament?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The United States, through the Senate, is attempting to interfere. The British Government at Paris was forced to yield to the demand of her colonies, and Great Britain wrote into this treaty her consent that they should be represented as independent nations in the assembly; and it is the reservationists of the Senate who are standing in the way of self-government, who are attempting to pull out of the fire the chestnuts of the British Empire, whose heads do not favor this growing independence of the colonies and dominions; and we are being placed in the attitude of refusing to our neighbor on the north and to the other colonies of the British Empire the right to independent representation. We are saying to them, in effect: "You have got to be represented by London. We will not consent to your independent representation. We will not consent to giving you a vote in the assembly independent of London. We will not consent to having you cast a vote contrary to the vote of the British Empire." That is unfortunately to be the attitude of the United States.

Mr. President, that is a splendid attitude to cultivate the friendship of our Canadian neighbor on the north, the neighbor with whom we have the chief business! Most of the business of Canada with the outside world is done with the United States. New York to-day is the financial center of Canada. Canada gets most of her imports from the United States and sends most of her exports to the United States. Immigration from the United States flows over into Canada, until to-day in Canada there are many men and women who were born in the United States, and we in the United States have hundreds of thousands of Canadians who sought their homes here and continue their relations there; and yet we propose to deny by this reservation to that great independent colony of Great Britain, that sacrificed in this war, as we did, tens of thousands of her men and millions of her money, the boon she asks of an independent representation in the assembly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not recall that Sir Robert Borden in the Canadian House of Commons stated that the representative of the United States, among others, had resisted the demand of the Dominion for this representation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, it is quite possible that the representative of the United States, foreseeing the petty struggle that would go on here by Senators quibbling over this and seeking to make capital out of it, realized that it would make the treaty more difficult to get through. He perhaps foresaw that Senators, like the Senator from Illinois and others, would rise here and claim that the United States had accorded to the British Empire six votes and that the United States had only one. He perhaps realized that it would make it harder to get through the Senate of the United States the giving of this boon to our neighbors. Nevertheless, I repeat that the United States should not take the position that it will refuse to our good neighbor on the north—our Anglo-Saxon neighbor on the north—the right to a separate vote in the assembly and will say to that neighbor, "You can only be represented by London in the affairs of this league."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator one more question. Does he recall the speech in the Canadian House of Commons of Mr. Fielding, for 16 years a minister of the Crown, in which he stated explicitly that logic was on the side of the contention of those in this country who insisted upon an equality of representation, in which he said that New York was more important to this Republic than the Dominion to the Empire? Surely the Senator will recall that speech.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not see the significance in the remarks, if I do recall them, Mr. President. I know this: That the United States, if it enters the league, is going to be the most powerful member of it. I know that the United States, by reason of its tremendous influence with the 20 Republics in the western world, over a number of which it exercises an absolute protectorate, would be far more potent, even in the assembly of the League of Nations, than the British Empire if all the six dominions of the British Empire voted in solidarity. But I know very well that some of those votes of the British colonies will be much more likely, if a question arises, to take the view of the United States than to take the view of Great Britain.

Take the matter of immigration, for instance. Suppose immigration becomes a question before the League of Nations, and suppose in some way it gets into the assembly. How will Canada vote, if Canada has a vote? Canada holds exactly the same views that the United States holds on the subject of Asiatic immigration. Great Britain does not. Great Britain would like to have some of the Asiatics under her dominions permitted to come to the Western Hemisphere. Canada will not admit them. Canada refused Chinese immigration and Japanese immigration, and upon the subject of Asiatic immigration Canada holds exactly the same views that the United States holds. So does Australia, that great independent nation in the Southern Seas. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Nebraska has repeatedly stated that this reservation deprives Canada of a vote. Does he mean that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator know that if the treaty is ratified with this reservation, Canada can not be deprived of a vote without her consent?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I mean, as a practical proposition, if we assert, in entering the league, and the other nations consent to it, that we will not submit to any election, judgment, decree, or finding by the assembly in which more than one vote is cast by the dominions of any empire, that that nullifies the election or decision, as far as we are concerned.

Mr. LENROOT. Who deprives her of the vote?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We do.

Mr. LENROOT. By what authority?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. By saying we will not submit to it.

Mr. LENROOT. By not being bound to it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. In other words, if an election is held and Canada casts one vote, we say we will not be bound by it.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator takes the position that if the United States is not bound by a certain act, the league will not act?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It could not. There could not be an election to which we refused to submit. Suppose there is an election and we refuse to submit to it. That voids the election.

Mr. LENROOT. How is that? Does the Senator mean to say that that voids the election?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It disrupts the league.

Mr. LENROOT. How?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If we refuse to recognize an election in which Canada has cast a vote, does it not void it?

Mr. LENROOT. Everyone else is bound except the United States. Is not that true?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it is not true.

Mr. LENROOT. Why not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. You can not run a league with a disruption in the midst of it by the leading power in it. I am not going to quibble with the Senator. He offered the reservation for the purpose of preventing Canada from voting. He is in the attitude of disfranchising Canada, and so is the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He is in the attitude of standing here in this Chamber and seeking to disfranchise his neighbors upon the north, Canada, although tens of thousands of Canadians have come and settled within his State and are good citizens of New Hampshire. He is in the attitude of saying to them, "I will not permit the country from which you came, our neighbor on the north, our friendly neighbor, with whom we have been at peace for a hundred years, I will not permit that country of yours from which you came even to cast a single vote in the assembly of the League of Nations."

You are in that attitude, every one of you who votes for this reservation. You are in the attitude of slapping our good neighbor in the face. You are in the attitude of saying to Canada, "We object to having you cast a single vote. We insist you shall remain under the dominion of the British Empire and permit the diplomatists from London to represent you in the League of Nations exclusively."

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator what his attitude is, then, toward India.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I can not make the same appeal for India that I can make for Canada. The people of India are separate and apart. I see no reason why India should have been accorded this vote. I suspect that the British Empire, forced to yield to the demands of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, probably thought it best to have India included also. I know of no other reason. Of course it is true that in India the demand for self-government and independence is growing. It is true that at the present time an agitation is in progress which will give to India, ultimately perhaps, a more or less complete system of self-government, and possibly that was included with a view to the day when India would have that self-government.

But the Senator dodges the issue. He can not say that Canada is not a self-governing dominion. He can not say that Canada is not practically an independent country. He can not say that Canada lacks our ideals or our high purpose. He knows, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] knows, that Canada has the same ideals that the United States has, the same standards that the United States has, a government very similar to the Government of the United States. There is no reason on earth why we should attempt to refuse to allow our Canadian neighbor on the north the right to a separate and independent vote in the assembly of the League of Nations, no reason why the United States should say to Canada, as you do say through this reservation, "We refuse you a right to a separate vote. You have to remain within the British Empire. You have to permit Great Britain to speak for you."

I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator to say that if immigration should become a subject for the council or the assembly, Canada would be more apt to vote with the United States than with Great Britain. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I expect you did.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator propose to make a treaty that gives the League of Nations control over immigration to this country?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then what was the object of the Senator's statement?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I just took it as an illustration, as one of the cases notoriously in which Canada agrees with the United States. There are many others. Her trade interests are practically the same as ours. Canada is a western country, the same as the United States is, has the same interests, the same surroundings, and the same necessities as the United States, and to a large extent is modeled in her industrial and political affairs on the United States, and is becoming more like the United States every day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would join with the Senator from Nebraska in any eulogy that he could deliver upon Canada. I do not think that imagination could conceive praise which would be higher than the Canadian people deserve for the heroism and the fortitude they exhibited in this great war; and I am willing to concede that the Canadian people are the equal of the people of the United States, man for man and woman for woman.

They are our brothers and our kindred, in a way. But what I object to is giving them six times as much influence in the League of Nations as we give to ourselves. My understanding of this compact is that it gives to the nation of which Canada is a part six votes in the assembly and gives to ourselves only one vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has a wrong impression.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I think not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does not give the votes to the British Empire. There is just as much likelihood of Canada voting against London as there is of the United States voting against London. The votes of those colonies may be divided three on one side and three on the other, and what I am pointing out to the Senator is that there is far more probability of the Canadian vote being cast with the vote of the United States than there is of its being cast with Great Britain, if the two differ. That is what I am pointing out, and the Senator insists all the time in treating them as a solidarity of votes, which is not true. There is a great deal more likelihood that there will be a solidarity of the votes between the United States and certain of the western Republics over which the United States exercises a protectorate than there is that there will be a solidarity of votes between the British Government and the Canadian Government and the other colonies.

The Senator knows that the vote of Panama, over which we exercise a sort of protectorate, and whose independence we guarantee, will always be with the United States. He knows that the vote of Cuba will always be with the United States. He knows that the vote of Haiti and the vote of Santo Domingo, over which we exercise protectorates, will always be with the United States; and he knows that the votes of other South and Central American countries which follow the United States, and which depend largely on our friendly support, will always be with the United States, and that fact constitutes the United States as the most powerful member of the league and she is ten times more apt to have those votes solidly behind her at all times on any question that comes up in the assembly than Great Britain is to have the votes of her colonies, because, Mr. President, it is well known that the colonies of Great Britain are constantly asserting and insisting on a larger measure of independence.

Differences have arisen between the mother country and her colonies and they long for a larger independence. Why? Not to agree with the mother country, but for the specific reason that they want to disagree with the mother country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it can not be denied that Canada is a part of the British Empire. It is only one nation, the British Empire. Canada is simply a Province of the British Empire; and the British Empire, including Canada and the various other self-governing colonies which are given votes under this covenant, has six times the representation in the assembly of the League of Nations, according to this covenant, that we ourselves have.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I deny it absolutely. I just denied it specifically.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I know the Senator denies it, and yet in denying it he denies the plain written words of this covenant, which gives 18 delegates——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This covenant does not say anything about the British Empire having 6 votes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does say something about it having 6 votes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; nothing at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It gives them 6 votes in the assembly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It says that each self-governing colony shall have 1 vote, and if that vote is independent of the mother country it is not the British Empire vote; it is in one case a Canadian vote, in another an Australian vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator can not separate Canada from the British Empire by his declarations to the contrary. It is a part of the British Empire, and the repetition of the Senator that it is an independent nation can not change that fact.

If the Senator will permit me, I would like to take this occasion to differ with him in his assertion that the votes of the various Central and South American countries will always be cast with the United States. There is no such relation existing between the United States and South American countries as exists between Canada and the British Empire, and there is no reason for the United States to suppose that it can trust its fortunes in the future to the good will of Haiti or the good will of Panama or to any control we may have over them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have made that assertion, and I make it upon the strength of the relations which we exercise with Haiti and Santo Domingo. Those countries are under our protection at the present time. They are largely dependent upon the United States. We have guaranteed the independence of Cuba and Panama, and their foreign affairs are largely under the influence and control of the United States.

The Senator saw a demonstration of this during the war and saw how those countries and others of South America followed the United States; and so I say that in the League of Nations, against the assertion that the colonial vote of the self-governing colonies in the league will be under the control of the British Empire, and even admitting that they should be, we would have a far greater strength in that same assembly by reason of those people of the small nations to the south of us.

I am glad to hear the Senator admit that as far as Canada is concerned he sympathizes with the statement that her people are as good as our people, and that her people are as much entitled to separate representation as we are. That is what it means.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not say that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is what it implies. I ask the Senator not to interrupt me any further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will interrupt only to the extent of correcting the Senator's quotation of my remarks. I said they were as good, but not better.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As good. I would not say they were any better. Nobody would admit that; but they are our equals. They deserve as much credit for action in this war as we deserve. They suffered far more than we suffered. They have a Government as intelligent as ours and as high minded, and, as I said, they have our ideals and many of our institutions. It is not possible that self-respecting Americans want to say to Canada, to the millions of people in Canada, our neighbors to the north, "We refuse you the right to a voice in the assembly which is accorded to dozens of other smaller countries than you are, less advanced than you are, and less entitled to representation in the assembly than you are."

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. I understood the Senator to say that Canada was an independent country. I hardly think that the Senator meant to use that term in a broad sense. I understand that the British Parliament is supreme over all her so-called independent dominions or colonies. I understand that Canada can not pass a law which is in conflict with any law passed by the Imperial Parliament. I understand that the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain can annul any law passed by the Canadian Parliament. I understand that the Parliament of Great Britain can repeal at once the Canadian constitution. In other words, I understand that the actual sovereign of the whole British Empire over its parts is the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain. I understand that especially the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain claims exclusive jurisdiction over all foreign affairs.

Therefore, while it is true generally that we speak of Canada as an independent dominion, because Great Britain permits her to have a large degree of independence, yet, in point of fact, the sovereign authority of the British Empire is the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, and it exercises absolute sovereignty over the entire British Empire.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not so familiar probably with the organization of Canada as is the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. His service upon the bench has given him advantages which I have not had. But Canada is recognized in this instrument by Great Britain as a self-governing colony and dominion. Canada has been moving steadily in the direction of a greater and greater independence. The British Parliament may technically have the power to legislate for Canada, just as the King of England technically has the power to veto an act of Parliament, but as a matter of fact he never does, and as a matter of fact the British Parliament never exercises the power.

The British Government learned in its treatment of the thirteen American Colonies in 1776 a lesson which has served to aid Canada and Australia and New Zealand and South Africa in their constant progress toward independence, and year by year they have taken a larger share of independence to themselves, and the British Government has not resisted it.

So when it came to the formation of this treaty England was compelled to yield to Canada, yield to New Zealand, yield to Australia, yield to South Africa in the demands they made for a separate representation of their own in the assembly of the League of Nations. Now, after these colonies have compelled the mother country to grant them this increase of independence, shall it be the United States, through this reservation, that will attempt to slam the door in their faces? Shall it be the United States, that has been at peace for more than 100 years with Canada, that has cultivated the friendliest relations with Canada, that will say to Canada, New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa, "We deny to you a separate vote in the assembly"?

Mr. President, I hope not. I would rather see a complete collapse of this already badly damaged enterprise than to have the United States be the one to prevent the great progress which these colonies are making toward becoming separate and independent countries. This is a great step, possibly not in the disintegration of the British Empire, but in the establishment of independence for the great colonies of the British Empire. We secured our independence quickly, and by war. They have been securing theirs gradually by evolution, but the ultimate independence is likely to be almost as complete in their case as it has become in ours.

I want to put into the RECORD a copy of a letter which came into my hands recently, written by Mr. J. C. Smuts, of the Union of South Africa, to a friend of his in the United States, as follows:

UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA,
Pretoria, January 19, 1920.

DEAR MR. GILDER: Thank you very much for your letter and the inclosed verses on "The Parting of the Ways," which had attracted my attention in some anthology. We are, indeed, all at the great parting of the ways in the history of civilization. At Paris a great battle for the soul of civilization was fought, and, in my opinion, won in that first chapter on the covenant of the League of Nations. That is the great creative word in favor of a new world order which has emerged from the noises of that conference.

America will understand all this yet and rally to the new banner under which the march of progress will be continued. When I read of our defeat in the Senate I thought of Walt Whitman's great lines:

"Have the elder races halted?
Do they droop and end their lesson, wearied over there beyond the seas?
We take up the task eternal, and the burden, and the lesson, Pioneers!
O Pioneers!"

The irony is that America seems to be halting, while exhausted Europe is clutching at the ideal in her desolation and despair. But I feel sure this is only a passing mood, due to misunderstanding, and that America will yet be one of the firmest and strongest supports of the new order of things.

I regret deeply that the Senate has made such a dead set at the equality of voting power given to the young nations of the British Commonwealth. Why should America, who was once also a British colony, grudge us our entry into the great family of free States through the portals of the league? But here, too, I feel sure she will yet understand.

Always, yours, sincerely, J. C. SMUTS.

Mr. REED. To whom is the letter addressed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Gilder.

Mr. REED. Who is he?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know.

Mr. REED. Is he an Englishman or an American?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know, and I do not care.

Mr. REED. I did not think the Senator cared.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that letter expresses the idea. America, which ought to be the first to welcome Canada, the first to welcome Australia and the other self-governing colonies into a new family of independent nations, which ought to be the first to encourage them to take up the responsibility of independent international representation—America is the very one which seeks to deny to them what they have wrung from the Government of the British Empire.

It is not to be thought that the British Empire or the Government of the Empire views with approval the determination of Canada to have independent representation, but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who sits over there and who is a neighbor of the Canadians, seeks to deny to Canada an independent voice in the assembly of the League of Nations. He and his colleague, neighbors of Canada, who ought to be in a position to know what Canada is and who Canadians are and what their ideals are and their institutions, step forward here in the Senate to refuse to Canada representation separate from the British Empire. He is forcing them back.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Thanking the Senator from Nebraska for this unexpected tribute in singling me out, I wish to enter a total disclaimer of any of the motives which the Senator imputes to me. I have no opposition and no objection to Canada or any other part of the British Empire having 1 or 6 or 20 votes in the assembly of the League of Nations, but I do insist that the United States shall go into the League of Nations with as many votes as any other power there represented will have.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President; that expresses it exactly. The Senator insists that Canada shall be treated simply as a subordinate part of the British Empire and denied independence.

Mr. MOSES. Is she anything else, Mr. President?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; Canada is an independent and self-governing country. This treaty accords to Canada independence in the assembly; it takes away from the British Empire the right and the power to represent Canada and gives that right to Canada herself; and the Senator from New Hampshire is proposing to deny it to Canada.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. MOSES. May I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that if Canada is seeking independence she may follow the regular diplomatic course, as pursued by the soviet republic in Russia, for example, and send an ambassador to the United States seeking recognition. She does not have to do it through any indirect method such as the Senator from Nebraska sets up, nor is she doing it. If she has a vote in the League of Nations, she has it under the ægis of the British Empire, of which she is a part, and I have no desire to deprive her of that vote. I do, however, strenuously object to the United States taking a part in any organization where the British Empire is superior to us by reason of the votes of her dependencies.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has already cast his vote in favor of a reservation which declares that the United States will not "be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, have cast more than one vote."

He thereby insists in that reservation that this country shall not be bound if any of the British colonies vote as well as the British Empire. That is denying to Canada the right to a separate vote, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, while the Senator from Nebraska shakes his fist at me, let me shake my finger at him, and say that if the Senator's record of votes upon all matters connected with this treaty had been as consistent as mine, he might well congratulate himself, for I, in the first instance, undertook, in cooperation with the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], to secure a direct amendment to the treaty which would give the United States equality of representation in the league; the Senator from Nebraska resisted it; and by means of the cooperation which he was able to secure from his side of the Chamber and from this the direct amendment, the only manful way of meeting the issue, was balked here in the Senate. Then, to be sure, Mr. President, I voted for the reservation, because there was no other course open if we were to assert in any sense the self-respect of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am very glad to know, Mr. President, the reason why the Senator from New Hampshire voted for that reservation. I agree with him that his votes have been entirely consistent. He has practically voted for every amendment to the league covenant that has been offered which would have destroyed the league.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska must not say "practically." I voted for every amendment offered to the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad to be accurate. I will say that the Senator voted for every amendment; every act of his has been in the direction of destroying the league.

Mr. MOSES. It has been in the direction, Mr. President, of rendering the treaty harmless to the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the Senator's reason, but, as a matter of fact, he has voted for every amendment which would kill the league; every amendment which the Senate rejected because it would kill the league, for a majority did not want to kill it; and the Senator voted for every reservation to nullify the league. So he voted for the reservation which proposed to deny to Canada and the self-governing colonies of the British Empire the right to escape from the control of the British Empire and to cast their own votes to suit themselves. I have not misrepresented the Senator from New Hampshire; I know what he has done; and I singled him out because he had been consistent.

Mr. MOSES. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for this further tribute, Mr. President.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I am jealous of the distinction. I think I also deserve the glorious opprobrium as well. I have sought it like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] sitting here, and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]; and there are others of us who are engaged in the same enterprise.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I presume that this reservation will carry, as it carried before, but I wish to take this occasion to file my protest, as an American, against the act of the United States in attempting to refuse to the self-governing colonies of the British Empire an opportunity to become free and independent nations in a greater degree than they now are. It is well known that their constant aspirations in recent years have been in the direction of independence; and at Paris they wrung from the British Empire and from the remainder of the world there represented recognition as being independent, partially at least, and entitled to be represented in the assembly. If the Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators want to deny that right to Canada, let them do so.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I am sure the lexicographers will be grateful to the Senator from Nebraska for the new interpretation which he has put upon the word "American."

Mr. McCORMICK. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gore	McKellar	Simmons
Beckham	Gronna	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hale	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Harris	Moses	Smoot

Gerry	Lodge	Sherman
Glass	McCormick	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if during the many months that the Senate has had under consideration the pending treaty the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] had shown half as much concern for the interests of the United States as he has this afternoon shown for the interests of Canada and the British Empire the treaty would have been ratified long ago, with proper Americanizing reservations.

Mr. President, I thought, as the Senator was speaking, that there must be many in the galleries this afternoon who imagined themselves sitting not in the gallery of the Senate of the United States but in the gallery of the Canadian House of Parliament or the British House of Commons. I am very sorry that the attitude of the Senator from Nebraska is more pro-British and less American than is the attitude of Lord Grey and the British foreign office, as I shall hereafter show. But, Mr. President, the attitude of the Senator from Nebraska was not always thus. Until this new world had been created in his imagination we never heard the Senator from Nebraska defending British diplomacy or the British Empire; and, in view of the statements he has made, I think I am justified in quoting to the Senate very briefly the views of the Senator from Nebraska upon the arbitration treaty before the Senate in 1912. I wish to say to the Senator that he can show nothing that occurred at the peace conference at Paris, nor anything that has intervened since the war, with regard to British diplomacy to indicate that there has been during that time any change in the character of British diplomacy from what it was in 1912.

This is what the Senator from Nebraska said in this body on January 4, 1912, speaking of the arbitration treaty with Great Britain then pending:

> Mr. President, anyone looking into the future, I believe, must admit that if this treaty, as it comes to us, is ratified by the Senate and goes into effect, Great Britain will have ten times the number of demands upon us for arbitration of questions in which she is interested as the proponent that we will have upon her.

And I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska, if that was true then, is it not equally true to-day?

> That is the natural course of events. Her interests are such, her policies are such, that she will be constantly seeking to restrain us and interfere with the American policies of this country.

And yet the Senator from Nebraska stands upon this floor and opposes a reservation that will prevent the British Empire from using her power to do those things which the Senator from Nebraska said the British Empire surely would do, if she had the opportunity, against the interests of this country.

He goes on:

> For that reason I think this country would be unwise to put itself, by an ironclad and practically unlimited treaty, in the position of promising to submit everything to arbitration that is justiciable, and then to leave the question of justiciability to a mixed commission, whose three American members are appointed by the President and responsible only to him. The interests of the country will be safer in the care of the Senate, and its restraint on the President should be maintained as provided in the Constitution.

Those were the views of the Senator from Nebraska then. Those were the views of the Senator when he was standing upon the floor of the Senate speaking as an American. He is speaking to-day not as an American but as an internationalist—no, not even as an internationalist, because an internationlist at all times would endeavor to see that the country from which he comes has at least equality of treatment, and he pleads here to-day for inequality against his own country in favor of a foreign nation!

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. MOSES. In connection with the manner in which the Senator from Nebraska has so constantly inveighed against Senators upon this side of the Chamber, I trust the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me to add to what he has already said the fact that the treaty which the Senator from Nebraska at that time opposed was one negotiated by a Republican President.

Mr. LENROOT. It was; and it did not propose or pretend to entail upon the United States any obligations comparable to the obligations which the Senator from Nebraska now wants the United States to assume under this peace treaty.

Just one further little quotation from the Senator's speech, made upon the same occasion. He said:

I think if we look over the history of the United States in recent years we will conclude that we are in more danger from the diplomats of Great Britain than we are from her dreadnoughts.

Yet to-day he is asking to increase the diplomatic power of the British Empire to a point where it will be six times greater than was the diplomatic power in this treaty which he then fought because of its being, as he said, inimical to American interests!

Mr. President, it is difficult to speak temperately in attempting to reply to the Senator from Nebraska, when one knows the attitude that he took only a short time ago, comparatively speaking.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska used as an illustration where the vote of Canada might be with the United States, and against Great Britain, the question of immigration. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] asked him a question as to whether he was in favor of submitting questions of immigration to the League of Nations. He said "no"; but nevertheless the RECORD shows that the Senator from Nebraska has voted against the reservations that have been adopted to this treaty precluding the League of Nations from taking under its jurisdiction any question of immigration or like domestic questions.

The Senator from Nebraska and his colleagues, by voting against that reservation, have taken the position that they desired to have the League of Nations determine whether a question is domestic or not; and if it determines that it is not, even though it does involve immigration, even though it does involve policies upon which the very existence of this Republic depends, the Senator from Nebraska and his associates nevertheless have voted to place those matters under the jurisdiction of the League of Nations. So the Senator was entirely correct in using the question of immigration as one that the League of Nations might consider and determine, and in saying that in that event that Canada might vote with the United States. But the Senator from Nebraska must know that, thanks not to him, but to those upon this side of the aisle, this treaty will never be ratified with any jurisdiction in the League of Nations to determine questions of immigration or any other like question for the United States.

The Senator from Nebraska read a very touching letter from Gen. Smuts, and a poem, and he referred most feelingly to the fact that the United States was once a colony, and that we should be tender of the colonies that now exist belonging to Great Britain. I agree; and Mr. President, if Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, or any of their colonies would secure their independence and freedom as the United States did, the United States would be the first to extend a welcome hand to them whenever they had secured their independence. This reservation, as I shall show in a moment, does not in the slightest degree affect the right of any of these colonies to vote; but, nevertheless, the fact is that what the Senator from Nebraska is pleading for is that these colonies, through their representatives, shall have all the rights of a free and independent nation, and have the power to impose obligations upon us, and at the same time have all of the privileges of a subject nation, because that is the international relationship of Canada and the British colonies. It has never been better stated than in the letter of Lord Grey to the London Times, and let me quote from it:

The self-governing dominions are full members of the league. They will admit, and Great Britain can admit, no qualification whatever of that right. Whatever the self-governing dominions may be in theory and in the letter of the constitution, they have, in effect, ceased to be colonies in the old sense of the word. They are free communities, independent as regards all their own affairs, and partners in those which concern the empire at large.

Mark the words, "partners in those which concern the empire at large." Now, that is an extreme statement, of course, because up to this good hour, at least, neither Canada nor Australia nor any other of the British colonies has ever pretended to have a full partnership, an equal voice, with Great Britain in the settlement of foreign policies. But, granting that this is true, what are they in regard to international matters, in matters affecting the British Empire as a whole? Independent? Separate? No; Lord Grey does not say that. The Senator from Nebraska does, but Lord Grey does not make any such claim. He says they are partners. What does a partnership mean? A partnership means an interest and concern for each member of the partnership in the business as a whole. A partnership means that in all matters coming before the League of Nations Canada will not act as an independent nation, but as a partner, one of the partners of the British Empire; and, being one of the partners of the British Empire, of course the interests of the British Empire will be its first concern.

We, therefore, are put in this position: The United States goes into a partnership with many partners, and one of her partners says: "Here, I have a partnership of my own, a partnership within a partnership, and we insist that each one of my partners shall have as many votes as any one of our other partners"; and in the particular case we have here the British Empire insists that she, having five partners, shall have six votes to one of each of the other partners.

Is there anyone who would say that that was a fair arrangement; that that was an arrangement that any American Senator, whether he might apologize for it or not, could advocate as the Senator from Nebraska has done? Why, of course not; and if something had not happened to the Senator from Nebraska in the consideration of this matter, whether it be blindly following President Wilson or what it may be, if he had had the same viewpoint that he had a few years ago, the Senator from Nebraska never would be heard advocating any such proposition as he now advocates.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. GORE. I want to ask the Senator if the speech referred to as having been made by the Senator from Nebraska some time ago was made before the Senator was overcome by the spirit of the new magic, before he was dazzled by the new vision upon the horizon, before he was enchanted by the new siren voices in the air?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; that was before we had a new order of things. That was before British diplomacy had been entirely regenerated.

But the Senator from Nebraska says that this reservation is unfair to Canada. Let us see. In adopting this reservation we are most generous to Canada and to each one of the colonies. The United States might well object to any of the colonies having any voice or representation of any character in the League of Nations. But the United States has not done so. This reservation does not do so. No one has proposed to deny to Canada or any other colony a vote in the League of Nations, and this reservation does not do so, nor purport to do so. If this reservation is adopted and the peace treaty ratified, Canada can not be deprived of a vote in the League of Nations upon any matter without her own consent.

The reservation merely states that in any case, if these votes are exercised, the United States is not bound by the decision thus made. But Canada can go on, nevertheless, and insist upon her right to vote.

Then what is the difficulty, and what is the objection of Canada? I think I know, Mr. President. It is very evident to me that Canada fears that if this reservation be adopted, Great Britain will so coerce her that she will not exercise the right to vote that is given her in a given case in order that the United States may be bound. And if that be true, Mr. President, it furnishes one of the strongest reasons for the adoption of this reservation, because if Canada feels that Britain could so coerce her as to have her yield up the right to vote in a given case, it is equally apparent that the same method of coercion upon any question that comes before the league would enable the British Foreign Office to command the vote of the representatives of the colonies in any way that they saw fit.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I interrupt the Senator to remind him that at the conclusion of the labor congress which met in Washington under the terms of the treaty delegates from continental Europe bitterly complained that Mr. Barnes, at the head of the labor delegation from Great Britain, delivered all the votes of the delegates from the component parts of the British Empire?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I rise merely to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that this is not a new trait in British diplomacy. In 1912, when we had the wireless international convention, Russia raised objection to the numerous votes that Great Britain claimed, and the United States backed Russia in the proposition. I happen to know whereof I am speaking, because I represented the United States in that diplomatic action. The United States then and there claimed equal voting power with Great Britain, and the treaty itself shows that the United States received equal voting power with Great Britain, and that we took over votes for Hawaii, Alaska, the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone, thus equalizing the vote.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Upon the question whether we do attempt to deprive Canada or the colonies of the vote, I again wish to quote from the letter of Lord Grey. He said:

> It may be sufficient to observe that the reservation of America does not in any way challenge the right of the self-governing dominions to exercise their votes.

Of course, the Senator from Nebraska says that it does. The Senator from Nebraska is asking more for the British Empire than Lord Grey is. The Senator from Nebraska says that this reservation deprives Canada of rights which Lord Grey says it does not deprive Canada of.

Mr. President, I have read a good many speeches during the past two or three weeks of Canadian statesmen upon this fourteenth reservation but there is not one of them that pleads so zealously for the interests of Canada as I heard the Senator from Nebraska plead this afternoon.

Lord Grey goes on—

> Nor does it state that the United States will necessarily reject a decision in which those votes have been cast. It is therefore possible—I think it is even more than probable—that in practice no dispute will ever arise. Our object is to maintain the status of the self-governing dominions, not to secure a greater British than American vote, and we have no objection in principle to an increase of the American vote.

Mr. President, the amendment that is now pending, the change in the reservation that is made in the reservation previously adopted, provides that until the United States is given an equal number of votes by amendment of the league covenant, with these other nations, we assume no obligation to be bound by their decisions, but any time they want to bind us, we point the way. If they amend the League of Nations, giving to the United States equality with the British Empire, we would be bound. But why any American, Mr. President, should object to this reservation when Lord Grey does not object to it is beyond my comprehension.

But, after all, Mr. President, is not that the reason and does it not explain the entire difficulty concerning this peace treaty? Oh, Mr. President, if Senators of the United States, all of them, were as anxious to protect the interests of America as they are to protect the interests of some foreign country we would not have any difficulty in getting together upon reservations to this treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator seems to be surprised that Lord Grey was so ready to concede the reservation which disfranchises Canada.

Mr. LENROOT. No; Lord Grey said it does not disfranchise Canada. The Senator from Nebraska says it does.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have already explained to the Senator that the British Government did not want to accord the vote to Canada, to Australia, nor to the other colonies. We ought to encourage those colonies in their work of becoming independent, not discourage them.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Nebraska has stated that Great Britain strenuously objected to their having a vote, but I have seen no evidence of that fact, and I do not think the Senator from Nebraska up to to-day has ever sought to produce any evidence substantiating the statement which he has just made.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I find myself in some difficulty in following the reasoning of the Senator from Nebraska. With great vigor he insists that the United States shall take an obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and to maintain the political independence of members of the league, and now he urges us by some subterfuge or by some underhand or indirect method to take steps which will encourage the colonies of the British Empire to throw off the yoke of the mother country. Which road does he intend to follow? Does he wish us to enter into this league and to ratify this treaty for the purpose of protecting the territorial integrity and political independence of members of the league, or does he wish us to take it just as it came from the hands of the master workmen at Versailles for the purpose of undermining the British Empire and lopping off its colonial members?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not think it is difficult for any Senator to follow the road along which the Senator from Nebraska would lead the Senate. It has been apparent for a long time that the road he is following leads to straight rejection, and I can see no purpose in the speech of the Senator from Nebraska this afternoon except to make trouble with Canada and arouse Canadian feeling against this treaty if it should be deposited at Geneva. The Senator's speech could have no other purpose. Has the Senator ever said that this equality of voting was the heart of the league? Has his chief ever said that? Does the Senator take the position—and he has said it this afternoon—that he would rather see this entire treaty collapse than to have this inequality remedied? Is that the Senator's position, in spite of hours and hours and hours of speeches that he has made here upon the Senate floor?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, the Senator knows that is not my position.

Mr. LENROOT. I have the Senator's words, that "I would rather see a complete collapse"——

Mr. McCORMICK. "Of the enterprise."

Mr. LENROOT. "Of the enterprise." Those were the Senator's words.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; than to see the United States take the position of denying the independence of these colonies.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say it is to the interest of the United States to encourage them in their effort to become independent.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, we have the Senator from Nebraska where there can be no misunderstanding. He would rather see this treaty fall than to have the United States take a position that would discourage the independence of the British colonies. That is what he has just said. If that be true, what is the value of this treaty? Is the heart and purpose of this treaty to encourage the Dominion of Canada to revolt? I had supposed that the purpose of this treaty was to maintain the peace of the world. I had supposed that he and his chief, the President, believed the heart of the treaty was in the arbitration articles and article 10. But now we have the Senator from Nebraska saying that the treaty might as well go to the scrap heap unless we take care that the British Empire has six votes to the United States one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator knows very well that my position is that with this reservation attached the treaty is already in the scrap heap, and it has not anything like the value it had when it came to the Senate. It is an entirely different proposition. It has been nullified and ruined by these reservations.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, the Senator says, first, that it is in the scrap heap by having these reservations attached, and then that it has not anything like the value that it had before the reservations were adopted. I can not follow the Senator from Nebraska. Does he mean to say that it was almost in the scrap heap when it was presented to us and had very little value? Because he says it has nothing like the value that it then had, or it would be in the scrap heap.

Mr. McCORMICK. There would be some Democrats in the same position as the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is true, and I think we all understand that the Senator from Nebraska has had a most tortuous road to follow and a most difficult task to perform. But I am very sure that if the Senator does not correct the statement that he just made, he will be sorry in the future to be faced with the statement that he would rather see this entire treaty fail than to have the British Empire deprived of the right to bind the United States by a vote of 6 to 1.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator has overestimated the difficulties of the Senator from Nebraska. It seems to me that anyone occupies a most comfortable situation who can every morning say: "Give us this day our daily thoughts," and have perfect confidence that the prayer will be granted. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, it has become the fashion in some quarters to attribute to Senators who hold that the United States must have as many votes as the British Empire an incurable hostility to the Empire and to England. Nothing that has been said by any of us who have insisted upon securing for the United States as many votes as those accorded to any other member of the league can be construed either as seeking to deny to the British self-governing dominions the voice which they would have or as underestimating the heroic sacrifices of the peoples of the British Empire in the Great War. Those of us who have been along the blasted fronts were the first among Senators to pay tribute to the resolution and the imperishable courage of the armies raised in England, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, the self-governing dominions, and even in India.

It is we, sir, I think, who have fully appreciated the true greatness of the British Empire and who are most ready to bear witness not only to the courage but the genius of the English. Conquerors and governors in every quarter of the world, merchants and mariners since the dawn of modern history, great lawgivers, astute diplomats! The evidence of their genius in the conduct of foreign affairs is to be found in the measure which was laid before the Senate by the chief representative of the United States, who returned defeated and not knowing it.

It would be well if Senators who desire to join in the ratification of this compact would spend more time in the study of historic facts and less in the composition of mellifluous phrases. In the consideration of the reservation now before the Senate and of the provisions of the covenant with which it would deal it would be profitable if there were more study of the anamolous constitution of the British Empire under which, as Lord Grey has said, the dominions are becoming independent in the conduct of their domestic affairs while they remain "partners," to use his term, in the conduct of foreign affairs. There, sir, is the precise distinction. I trust that some Senators on the other side of the aisle who are jealous of the interests of the United States will remind the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that only the other day a case involving the validity of a statute of the Province of Saskatchewan in the course of appeal finally reached the Privy Council in London, and there, by the legal committee of that Privy Council, was set aside as in violation of the British North America act. That is not unusual under the British North America act, which is the constitution of the Dominion. My friend the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. Will bear me out that in the ordinary course of affairs, during a long period and until this time, appeals have been taken to the Privy Council in London. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the fact that when we speak of the constitution of Canada, employing that term in the sense we use the word "constitution" in the United States, it is a misnomer. In our Constitution it is declared that all powers are vested in the people, and the people in the manner and form laid down can change their Constitution, because they are the source of authority, and our Constitution is a bill really of limitation upon the powers of government, whereas this act of the British Parliament, which is referred to as the constitution, is nothing but a concession of powers by the Imperial Government to a colony, powers which it can grant and powers which it can take away. It is, therefore, in no sense a constitution such as we possess, but it is a mere privilege exercised by the grace of the Crown and revocable at the pleasure of the Imperial Government of the Empire.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Missouri will remember that I referred to the so-called constitution of the Dominion as the British North America act.

Mr. REED. I am not criticizing the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is thus that in Canada reference is made to it in law and in the vernacular. I was not addressing myself to the legal character of the instrument under which Canada is governed, but to the current practice, because the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] referred to the practice, to the evolution of independence.

Let me suggest that it would be well to follow current history to determine how far that evolution has advanced. It was only the other day that one of the ministers of the Crown of Canada, Mr. Meighan, in addressing a Canadian audience upon this very resolution now before the Senate, said that the Dominion Government had made representations to the foreign office in London and asked Downing Street to communicate through the British Embassy in Washington with the Government of the United States. Perhaps those representations were made before the appointment of his British Majesty's ambassador to Washington had been gazetted. Since Mr. Meighan spoke we have read that Sir Auckland Geddes, described in the dispatches as a Canadian, has been appointed British ambassador in Washington and that in order to accept that appointment he resigned the presidency of McGill University in Quebec.

Mr. President, in order to get more light on this anomalous situation I have sought the debates in the several Parliaments of the several Dominions upon the ratification of the treaty. Sir Robert Borden alluded to the British Empire as a league within a league. Gen. Smuts, to whom reference has been made on the floor of the Senate to-day, used precisely the same language. He asserted during the course of debate that the British Empire was a union, perpetual and indivisible. In answer to the contention of the small minority in South Africa he spoke in terms which might have been put in the mouths of Webster and his fellows in the Senate. He spoke of the whole Empire, including the Dominions, in terms exactly analogous to those in which during the great days of the Senate Daniel Webster and those who shared his views spoke of the union.

The view of a league within the league held in South Africa and Canada is shared, as far as I can learn, by the political leaders of Australia. In New Zealand there is a grave divergence of opinion.

Whatever may be said upon the abstract merits of according a vote to the Dominions, or whatever may be said of their prospective union with America in the assembly, not even the Senator from Nebraska has ventured to defend, as did the President, the gift of a vote to the Empire of India. That vote will be nominated by the British India office, but it must be cast, as every vote of the British Empire must be cast, with a view to the public opinion of India, in so far as it may be articulate.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] on Saturday spoke eloquently against the Turks remaining in Constantinople. We know that Mr. Lloyd-George has palliated, defended, excused the continuance of the Turk in Constantinople because of demands therefor by the 60,000,000 or 70,000,000 Mohammedans in India.

That is a vote which very definitely falls in the same category as those of the four American States to which the Senator from Nebraska referred. But I make bold to add that for each of the four American States asserted to be under the protectorate of the United States there are four European or Asiatic States under the protectorate of the British Empire. For Haiti there is Siam. For Santo Domingo there is the Hedjaz. For Panama there is Portugal. For Cuba there is Persia.

If it come to the pursuit of votes, the advantage which we may have in the Americas will find its counterpart in the advantage which the British will have among the new and weak States on the Baltic and in central Europe. A few years hence it will defy belief to assert that Senators stood upon this floor to defend the proposition that the British Empire should be accorded six votes to one vote for the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator correctly stated that the entire foreign relations of Canada were in the hands of the British Government. He might have gone further and said that the executive power in Canada is vested in the governor general of Canada, who is appointed by the King, and in the Privy Council; and that, furthermore, under certain provisions of the British North America act the King or Queen of Great Britain reserves a veto power. So, to say that Canada is entirely independent, as much so as is the United States, is to show a surprising ignorance about the organization of the Canadian Government.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the pending reservation is very little more to my liking than it is to that of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I have been constrained to vote for it only because the Senate, shrinking from its duty, as I think, has failed by amendment of the treaty or by reservation to provide explicitly that as a condition of our adhesion to the treaty and the covenant as many votes shall be accorded the United States as are accorded the British Empire.

There are Senators who have felt less strongly on this score than have I; Senators have justified their support of the reservation introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on the ground that to go further would make impossible the present ratification of the treaty and the present acceptance by the United States of the conditions of the covenant. Since the issue has been presented to the Senate the second time, I have sought to meet the legitimate American demand for an equality of votes, without arousing the apprehensions of some of my colleagues, by preparing an amendment to the reservation now before us, which reads as follows:

Unless within one year after the filing of this act of ratification part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, shall be entitled to cast, the United States shall cease to be a member of the League of Nations.

Nothing therein prejudices the ratification of the treaty, but provision is made that unless within one year after the act of ratification is filed in Paris the covenant of the league be amended to accord to the United States as many votes as are accorded to the British Empire we shall withdraw.

There are Senators more royalist than the King, more jealous of the interests of the British Empire and its advantage than is Lord Grey, less respectful of the public opinion and the legitimate rights of the people of the United States than he has been. Sir, as has been said before in this Chamber, no matter what the action of the Senate may be the issue of the equal vote can not down, and Senators who to-day or to-morrow vote against an equality of votes for the United States will find themselves going hither and yon upon the hustings and upon the stump seeking to explain and explain again how it was that they were less zealous for American rights than was Lord Grey of Fallodon.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, so much has been said in reply to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and so well said, that the remarks I had intended to make are largely unnecessary. However, I can not refrain from calling attention to two or three strange contrarieties of position which the Senator occupies.

On Friday, I believe it was, possibly on Thursday, of last week the Senator from Nebraska grew eloquent in declaring that the British Empire was a democracy more responsive to public opinion than the Government of the United States. To-day he tears passion to tatters as he proclaims that above everything else he desires to release Canada from the thraldom of the British Empire. One day the British Empire is the greatest and the purest democracy of earth; the next day Canada is bound in the galling chains of servitude by a great Empire from which she vainly struggles for release.

If the British Empire is what the Senator said it was on Thursday or Friday, then, instead of seeking to dismember it and to deprive its citizens of the beneficence of its democratic government, he ought to be urging that we should do nothing tending in the least to lessen the allegiance of any of its colonies. When it suits the Senator from Nebraska to regard the British Empire as a great central power dominating unwilling subjects, he takes that position; when it suits him to declare it is the greatest democracy on earth, he assumes that attitude; and so, as I stated the other day, referring to the parable from Æsop, he runs upon one set of legs when it suits him, and when he can not employ them without a blush he whirls over and runs upon the other set of legs.

It has been said that a man can not ride two horses going in opposite directions at the same time, but the Senator from Nebraska has broken all precedents and has denied all rules, for he, at least, can go in two different directions at the same moment without embarrassment.

Mr. President, if the British Empire is the greatest democracy on earth, more responsive to the will of its people than any other country on earth, why is it that the Senator wants to take Canada from under the British flag? Why does he want to encourage Canada to renounce her allegiance to the mother country? Why in one breath is he demanding that we shall pledge the life and the blood of our sons to preserve the territorial integrity of the British Empire, and in the next insistent that the Senate shall take action which will encourage the dismemberment of the British Empire? The jewel of consistency does not adorn the escutcheon of Nebraska's senior Senator.

The Senator has declared that the League of Nations "is necessary to preserve the civilization of the world." He tells us unless we adopt it "the world will again be soaked in blood of millions," "all its hills and valleys will be white with the bones of the slain," "chaos will rule," and "the foot of tyranny will rest upon the breasts" of the few survivors of the human race. All this is to come to us if we do not have the League of Nations; and yet the Senator states that he would rather have the entire League of Nations fail than to deprive Canada of the right to a vote in the League of Nations. One position or the other is absurd; the two can not stand together. If the League of Nations means to the world a thousandth part of what its advocates assert it means, then the question whether Canada shall or shall not vote in the league ought not to result in its destruction or abandonment. Likewise a dispute over the rights of Fiume, a city containing 50,000 Italians, should not be permitted to wreck the world, to drive humanity to terrible and destructive wars, and to hurl civilization into the very chasm of destruction.

Mr. President, let us examine the question that is now presented. It is not proposed to deprive Canada of a vote, although, as I shall show in a few moments, she is not entitled to a vote, because she is not an independent nation, neither is she a free moral agent in the councils of the world. What is proposed? That we shall take Lord Grey at his word; and, although his words have been referred to, I want to read them into the RECORD literally:

Our object is to maintain the status of the self-governing dominions, not to secure a greater British than American vote, and we have no objection in principle to an increase of the American vote.

Here stands Lord Grey proclaiming to all the world that the Empire is willing the United States shall have as many votes in the League of Nations as the British Empire, including its colonies. With that statement from an eminent British statesman, who speaks beyond question for his Government, we find an American Senator protesting against America possessing that equality which Great Britain states America is entitled to have!

You may ransack the annals of American history and you will not find an instance where an American statesman has taken a position so un-American and so pro-British.

Mr. President, much eulogy has been passed upon the people of Canada. They are our neighbors. They are more like us than any other people in the world. They are gallant in war and efficient in the arts of peace; a splendid people; but I refuse to consider the Canadian people, as a whole, the equals of the people of the United States. If they loved liberty as we do, assuming that the people of the United States are like the old red-blooded Americans of the past, they would not stay under the British flag. They would assert and obtain their independence. That is for them to determine. They have seen fit to remain a part of Great Britain; and I affirm now that according to every line of their written history they are as loyal to the British flag and to the Government of the Empire as the most loyal citizen of London. So that when we come to consider them, without the slightest reflection upon them, we must remember that fundamentally they are Britishers.

Let me call attention again to another proposition. There are only 65,000,000 Britishers in the whole world. Approximately 42,000,000 of them reside in England, Scotland, and Wales; the rest of them are distributed among the various colonies and dependencies of Great Britain, or scattered throughout the world. Sixty-five million Britishers control and dominate the entire British Empire. That 65,000,000 Britishers, under this pact as now drawn, will cast six votes in the League of Nations, and 110,000,000 American citizens will cast one. It is proposed by the Senator who assumes to speak for the President that we shall refuse to take an equality of voting when Great Britain stands tendering it to us!

I should like to hear the Senator from Nebraska defend that proposition in his own State.

Why, Canada has 2,000,000 less people than the State of New York alone, counting all of their population; and quite a considerable portion of that population speaks the French language, and was so averse to the support of this war that the draft was made necessary in Canada in order to force them into the service.

Would there be any incongruity in providing that the United States shall have as many representatives in the League of Nations as the British Empire, including her colonies, in view of the fact that Lord Grey concedes that we are entitled to as many votes? Would there be any difficulty in writing into this treaty a single word, changing the word "one" to the word "six" where it applies to the United States? Is that an insurmountable obstacle? Does the Senator from Nebraska think there is a page in the Senate who could not take the document and make that change? And does the Senator from Nebraska imagine that our representatives would be rejected if they were to go to the new capital of the world to lay the honor and the sovereignty of the United States at the feet of the new world government?

Mr. President, let me for a moment inquire as to what is the real status of Canada with reference to the Imperial Government of the Empire.

I recognize the temerity involved in undertaking to discuss the laws of a foreign country. We are all under a handicap when we try to speak of the government of another country than our own. I have only been able to make a hasty examination of the Canadian act. Nevertheless I venture to assert that Canada does not possess a constitution in the sense we use that word; that she never has had a constitution; that every right the Canadian people possess is a grant of grace, revocable at the pleasure of the Imperial Government of the Empire.

Repeating what I said a few moments ago, the so-called constitution of Canada bears no resemblance whatsoever to the American Constitution. When our fathers declared the liberties of this people they asserted that all just government derives its powers from the consent of the governed. They affirmed that every human right is vested in the people themselves, and that no power of government exists save that which is granted by the people who create and set up.

This people, the source of all power and of all authority, saw fit then to write a Constitution—for what purpose? Chiefly to prescribe and limit the powers the agents they appointed to exercise the functions of government might assume. They prescribed, first, just what powers those agents might exercise. They prescribed, second, certain powers that they could under no circumstances assume to exercise. They reserved to the several States and the people thereof all other powers not expressly granted to the Federal Government, and they provided that this Constitution of limitation and of grant could be by the people of the United States at any time revoked, altered, amended, or changed as the people saw fit, in the manner and form the people themselves had prescribed. That is a Constitution of the people. It is a Constitution that springs from the people and is always under the control of the people.

But what of this so-called constitution of Canada? To begin with, every Britisher is a subject, not a sovereign; not an independent man, but a subject, born in the condition of subjection. He possesses no rights that the British Parliament, in connection with the British Crown, can not take away whenever they see fit to take them away. The source of authority, therefore, is found in the British Parliament and in the Crown of Great Britain. That source of authority saw fit to grant to Canada certain rights. The power to grant always carries with it the power to withdraw. The sovereignty is yonder in the Imperial Government. That sovereignty has merely granted to Canada as of grace certain privileges. That same sovereign power can at any moment be exercised to take from Canada every right it has granted. The Imperial Government is supreme.

So that the so-called constitution is not a constitution at all. The people of Canada can not change it, the people of Canada can not annul it, the people of Canada can not amend it, the people of Canada can do nothing whatsoever with it. They can exercise certain privileges granted to them as of grace, and no more. When they come to exercise those rights, as I shall show you, they do so subject to the supreme power of the sovereignty, and that sovereignty is in England, not in Canada.

I have taken the pains to get the Canadian act and desire briefly to call attention to its terms. It reads:

Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom—

An unwritten constitution, changeable by the Parliament of England at any time.

And whereas such a union would conduce to the welfare of the Provinces—

And so forth.

Be it therefore enacted and declared by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

This act may be cited as the British North America act, 1867.

The provisions of this act referring to Her Majesty the Queen extend also to the heirs and successors of Her Majesty, Kings and Queens of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that on and after a day therein appointed, not being more than six months after the passing of this act, the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall form and be one dominion, under the name of Canada; and on and after that day those three provinces shall form and be one dominion under that name accordingly.

I am omitting parts. Now, mark this:

The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Mr. GORE. Read that again.

Mr. REED. It says:

The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

The provisions of this act referring to the governor general extend and apply to the governor general for the time being of Canada, or other chief executive officer or administrator for the time being carried on the Government of Canada on behalf and in the name of the Queen, by whatever title he is designated.

There shall be a council to aid and advise in the Government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada; and the persons who are to be members of that council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor General and sworn in as privy councillors, and members thereof may be from time to time removed by the Governor General.

* * * * * * *

All powers, authorities, and functions which under any act of Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick are at the union vested in or exercisable by the respective governors or lieutenant governors of those Provinces, with the advice, or with the advice and consent of the respective executive councils thereof, or in conjunction with those councils, or with any member or members thereof, or by those governors or lieutenant governors individually, shall, as far as the same continue in existence and capable of being exercised after the union in relation to the Government of Canada, be vested in and exercisable by the Governor General, with the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, etc.

Reading now from paragraph 14 of the third division or article, and abbreviating, it proceeds:

The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all naval and military forces of and in Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Until the Queen otherwise directs, the seat of Government of Canada shall be Ottawa.

Coming to the Government of Canada, there are two houses, the Commons and the Senate. The qualification for Senators shall be as follows:

He shall be of the full age of 30 years. He shall be either a native-born subject of the Queen or a subject of the Queen naturalized by an act of Parliament of Great Britain.

And so forth.

He shall be legally or equitably seised, as of freehold for his own use and benefit, of lands or tenements held in free and common socage, or seised or possessed for his own use and benefit of lands for tenements held in franc-allue or in roture within the Province for which he is appointed, of the value of $4,000, over and above all rents, dues, debts, charges, mortgages, and incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same.

He has to be a rich man in order to be in the Senate. Here is how they are selected:

The Governor General shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the great seal of Canada, summon qualified persons to the Senate; and, subject to the provisions of this act, every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a senator.

So they are not elected, but are appointed, or were, at the time of this act. If the law has been changed, I have not learned of it.

Such persons shall be first summoned to the Senate as the Queen by warrant under Her Majesty's royal sign manual thinks fit to approve, and their names shall be inserted in the Queen's proclamation of union.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, does that read "summoned to the Senate by the Queen's royal sign manual"?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Under our practice we are summoned from the Senate under a royal sign manual.

Mr. REED. This proceeds:

If at any time on the recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that three or six members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by summons to three or six qualified persons (as the case may be), representing equally the three divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

In case of such addition being at any time made, the Governor General shall not summon any person to the Senate, except as a further like direction by the Queen, on the like recommendation, until each of the three divisions of Canada is represented by 24 senators and no more.

A senator shall, subject to the provisions of this act, hold his place in the Senate for life.

That is a glorious democracy. If some of our Senators held for life, they might exercise their own opinions probably a little more freely just now, but likewise they would exercise them more freely when the voice of the American people would sound upon their deaf and secure ears.

A senator shall, "subject to the provisions of this act, hold his place in the Senate for life."

And then they give the disqualifications or the things that remove him. The fifth one of those is:

He shall cease to be a senator—

Now, notice. When the people of Canada want him out? When his constituency regard his as unfit? No—if he ceases to be qualified in respect of property or of residence; * * *.

So if a man loses his property, out he goes. No matter how honest he is, no matter how efficient he is, no matter how patriotic he is, if he has not the filthy lucre, he can not sit in this "democratic body" that is appointed for life, appointed not by the people but by the Crown.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read paragraph 4:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated.

I shall not read them. It is sufficient to say that they deal with local matters. They do not deal with foreign matters. But I ask leave to have them printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VI. DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE POWERS.

POWERS OF THE PARLIAMENT.

91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—

1. The public debt and property.
2. The regulation of trade and commerce.
3. The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.
4. The borrowing of money on the public credit.
5. Postal service.
6. The census and statistics.
7. Militia, military, and naval service and defense.
8. The fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Government of Canada.
9. Beacons, buoys, lighthouses, and Sable Island.
10. Navigation and shipping.
11. Quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals.
12. Sea-coast and inland fisheries.
13. Ferries between a Province and any British or foreign country or between two Provinces.
14. Currency and coinage.
15. Banking, incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.
16. Savings banks.
17. Weights and measures.
18. Bills of exchange and promissory notes.
19. Interest.
20. Legal tender.
21. Bankruptcy and insolvency.
22. Patents of invention and discovery.
23. Copyrights.
24. Indians, and lands reserved for the Indians.
25. Naturalization and aliens.
26. Marriage and divorce.
27. The criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters.
28. The establishment, maintenance, and management of penitentiaries.
29. Such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the Provinces.

Mr. REED. So, Mr. President, there is your democratic independent government in Canada. The seat of authority in all matters is in the Imperial Government, but it has granted to Canada for the time being, and as long as it may see fit to so permit, a power over domestic affairs. But it has withheld power over international questions.

That I am correct in that is demonstrated by the words I am about to read. I hold in my hand a book entitled "Clements's Canadian Constitution." It is a commentary by the Hon. W. H. P. Clements, B. A., LL. B., judge of the supreme court of British Columbia. At page 134 this will be found:

Internationally, State recognizes only State. A colony, no matter how complete for purposes of local self-government its political organization may be, is nevertheless a subordinate community and has no place in the councils of the nations. It can not therefore be, internationally, a party to an act of State. In all intercourse with foreign powers the British nation is represented by the Crown, acting only upon the advice and with the consent of the British ministry.

Now, I call special attention to the words I am just going to read:

The appointment of those who are to act as the accredited agents of the nation rests necessarily with the Crown in Council (Imperial).

I read it again:

The appointment of those who are to act as the accredited agents of the nation rests necessarily with the Crown in Council (Imperial). Treaties and diplomatic arrangements of all sorts are made between His Britannic Majesty as the Empire's representative and embodiment and the executive head of each foreign State. Over none of these matters have the colonial governments or legislatures any control or jurisdiction, prima facie.

Who will appoint the representatives of Canada and of India and of Australia under this law? According to this author they can only be appointed by the Imperial Government of the Empire. No act of the British Parliament has yet been passed granting any such right to Canada.

It has been argued that Canada will act with the United States. I wonder if the representatives of Canada will act with the United States? Every Canadian officer of whatsoever character or degree is required to take an oath. I read that oath:

I, A. B., solemnly swear by Almighty God that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty, King George the Fifth, his heirs and successors, according to law.

So that the Canadian officer who goes to represent Canada upon the league does so with the oath resting upon his conscience that he will "be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty, King George the Fifth, his heirs and successors, according to law." Yet the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who as usual is absent after having delivered his oration, would have us understand that a British subject, having taken that kind of an oath, will act independently of Great Britain, will owe the British Empire no allegiance, will be not only independent, but that he will vote with the United States against the very Government whose authority he has sworn to uphold and to which he has pledged his allegiance and faith before Almighty God in heaven. Mr. President, if absurdity can go further than that, then absurdity knows no limits.

There is one other point I want to make very briefly. I refer to the oft-repeated assertion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that in the League of Nations the South American States will vote with the United States. How does he know that? Some of them have come in and some of them have stayed out of the league; but let us assume that they all come in. How does the Senator from Nebraska know what the Latin States in South America will do in a controversy between the United States and any of other country over any question? As a matter of fact, practically all of their trade is with Europe. European nations have great banking houses established among them; European capital is financing them to a very large extent; European colonies or practically European colonies exist among all of them that are of importance. The ships of commerce do not chiefly ply between South American ports and those of the United States. They ply between South American ports and the ports of Europe. We have been trying to establish trade there with but indifferent results; indeed, we made but slight progress until the war rendered it almost impossible for South American States to trade with Europe. Now that the war is over, in order for us to maintain trade relations of importance we are finding it necessary to practically subsidize ships in order to have them ply between the United States and South American ports.

What is there to bind these people particularly to us? Their language is different. Their origin in Europe is not that of our people. The character of government handed to them by their fathers is not like our Government. However much it may resemble it in its outside form, its spirit and its substance are entirely lacking in nearly all of the South American States. I do not say this unkindly; but theirs is a Spanish civilization, not an Anglo-Saxon civilization.

I placed in the RECORD a good while ago statistics showing the degree of literacy in these countries, and it was astonishingly and disappointingly low in all of them. Where are their prejudices and their natural feelings? I wish that they were with North America; but is it not a fact that they have shown a disposition on numerous occasions not to stand with North America? When we entered this war the President summoned South American States to join us in what he then for the first time proclaimed a great world effort to regenerate and save mankind. Did they come? One or two of them technically declared war, and there the matter ended. So far as I know, not a dollar of money, not a soldier, not a gun did they contribute.

But, sir, I call attention to this important fact: South American countries like the Monroe doctrine when we are exercising it distinctly and absolutely to protect them in accordance with their wishes at the time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator is doing a great injustice to Brazil. It contributed quite largely in ships and money to the war.

Mr. REED. I accept the correction. Can the Senator tell me how much they contributed?

Mr. MYERS. I can not give the exact amount of money nor the exact number of ships, but they contributed quite considerably.

Mr. REED. Very well; one out of all. It serves to point the absence of the rest.

It has frequently happened, as I was saying, that the South American countries have protested against the exercise by the United States of what some of them are pleased to regard at times as an arbitrary power, just as Mexico has recently repudiated the Monroe doctrine. Now, I am going to assume that every South American country joins the League of Nations. A controversy arises because the Government of one of the South American countries desires to make an arrangement with a European country which it thinks is to its advantage and which the United States regards as a violation of the Monroe doctrine.

I want to ask Senators here why that State, under the League of Nations compact, can not appeal that controversy to the League of Nations and can not insist that it is entitled to the judgment and decision of the League of Nations without reference to that question? If they so insist, and the League of Nations votes with them and sustains them, what will be the remedy of the United States of America? Plainly we will have but one remedy, and that will be to repudiate the decision of the League of Nations and thus possibly bring upon us not only the enmity of South American States but the entire power of the world massed back of the league.

You can not have two sovereigns at the same time; you can not have two superior powers at the same time; you can not have a Monroe doctrine controlled by the United States of America and at the same time have members of the League of Nations who are of right entitled to go to the League of Nations for decision upon every disputed question which arises in this hemisphere or in the other.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say in regard to the matter, but this talk about Canada being an independent Government is balderdash, if I may use so common an expression.

What says the Senator from Nebraska about India? India will have a vote in the league. Is that the vote of an independent democracy? Eleven hundred Britishers constitute the governing class in India, where there are 290,000,000 people. I wonder if that Government, in the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska, is entitled to a representation as an independent people? Does he doubt that those 1,100 Britishers, all of them officers of the Crown, will fail to do the bidding of the Imperial Government of the Empire?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. The Senator will probably remember that the newspapers carried a story during the war that the real people of India indicated a willingness to furnish, I believe, 5,000,000 or 10,000,000 troops in exchange for self-government.

Mr. REED. Yes; I recollect that, but the people of India will probably recognize the fact that in all her history Great Britain has never relinquished her hold upon a country except when the demand for liberty was backed by an army she could not overcome.

Mr. President, to assume that 1,100 Britishers in India constitute a self-governing and independent colony, and that they are better entitled to a vote in the league than the great State of New York, or than half a dozen of the great Western States, or than any State in the Union, or than any city in the Union, or than any village in the Union, is to assume an absurdity. A man has to be afflicted, and very badly afflicted, with the disease known as Anglomania before he can stand on the floor of the Senate or elsewhere in this country and make the astonishing assertions just uttered by the Senator from Nebraska. He does not speak for me. He does not speak for the Democratic Party. He does not speak for the United States.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have a very brief article by Mr. Samuel Russell, who has written considerably upon the League of Nations and upon fiscal matters, containing a short discussion of article 10 of the league covenant. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I will have to object.

Mr. KING. I understood that all articles with respect to the League of Nations, by common consent, did not come within the understanding that was entered into the other day.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that such articles come under the ban. The only articles allowed to go in the RECORD, if we can keep them from going in by a vote of the Senate, are resolutions from city councils and from the legislatures of States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made by the Senator from Utah to the request of his colleague.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate, as in open executive session, take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 9, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 8, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art the all in all, life of our life, spirit of our spirit, the confirmation of the immortality of the soul—a fairer life to be. But now is the day of salvation, one world at a time, to develop the good, the pure, the noble.

"Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern.

"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

Deliver us, we beseech Thee, from the petty cares of life, the discords which spoil the harmony of the soul with Thee. Let faith be our anchor, hope be our lead, and love reign supreme, that we may meet the life that now is with calmness, serenity, and nobility of soul. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 6, 1920, was read and approved.

THE APPOINTMENT OF A SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. WALSH assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a personal matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, as Members are aware, the rule allows the Speaker to appoint a substitute for only one day, but it does allow him in case of illness to nominate a substitute for 10 days. I have been so fortunate in the nine months that we have been in session as not to lose a day on account of illness, and I do not make any requests for sympathy on account of ill health now, but at the same time I have been getting a little fagged, and I believe a short change would do me good. Therefore, I am going to ask unanimous consent of the House that I may appoint a substitute to act for me for 10 days, and I submit the following order and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I ought to say that I have consulted the Committee on Rules about this and they unanimously acquiesced in my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the order, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Speaker may at any time during the present month name a Member to perform the duties of the Chair for a period not exceeding 10 legislative days, who shall have authority to sign bills and appoint select and conference committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Tennessee speaks I would like to say that I think the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], the present Speaker, ought to be made a permanent rule of the House. I had eight years' experience as Speaker of this House. Speakers, like other Members, have occasionally to go somewhere, and if they went everywhere they were invited to go they would be on what Charles II called travels all of the time, and the one day for which the Speaker may appoint a substitute under the rules is entirely too short a time. For instance, if the Speaker is invited over to New York or to Pittsburgh or somewhere else to make a speech on an important occasion, he has to hurry a good deal to get back even from New York within the day. He can not get back from Pittsburgh. When Senator Stone died the Missouri delegation wanted me to go as one of the funeral party. I was exceedingly fond of Senator Stone and under profound obligations to him. It would take six days to go where he was to be buried and get back here. I did not ask permission, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], then acting as minority leader, very graciously asked unanimous consent that I be permitted to appoint a Speaker while I was gone, which I did. It turned out that instead of finishing that trip I had to go to New York to see my son, who was to go to France with the Army. It took about 10 days to do what I did at that time.

There is no sense in this one-day performance. I am in favor of making this a permanent rule of the House. It is an exceedingly stupendous assumption to think that there is nobody in the House fit to preside over the House except the Speaker. What I propose would give the Speaker some leeway, such as other Members have. Any other Member of the House can pick up and leave here and go away and stay a week or two weeks, and some of them three or four months, without asking the consent of anyone. It is not fair to the Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I reserved the right to object, I feel that in justice to myself I should make this statement. The Speaker did the Committee on Rules the honor of consulting it with regard to this matter. The minority members of that committee were very happy to accede to the Speaker's request and to agree that a rule would be presented providing for this, if it should be necessary to do so. On behalf of the minority members of that committee I want to say that we are most happy to do this courtesy to the Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, of course I shall not object to the request, but I take it that the substitute would be a Speaker pro tempore. I have not examined the precedents lately, but I think that where the Speaker pro tempore is authorized to sign bills and appoint conferees, it is necessary for the House to notify the Senate and possibly the President.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. During the last Congress on one occasion, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was acting as Speaker of the House, I had the honor of being elected Speaker pro tempore, being elected by the House. An examination was then made of the precedents, and it was determined that as a matter of safety it was best for the Speaker pro tempore to take the oath, and also that the Senate and the President be notified.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Was that done by resolution of the House?

Mr. GARRETT. It was done by resolution of the House—that is, the notification to the Senate and the President.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I should think that would be necessary.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I have not the floor.

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman a question. In the case to which he has referred in the last Congress was the Speaker pro tempore elected by the House or appointed by the Speaker himself?

Mr. GARRETT. My recollection for the moment is that I was elected by the House.

Mr. DYER. That is my recollection.

Mr. GARRETT. I may have been designated by the Speaker, but I think I was elected by the House. It was only for a day, I think, but in any event, whichever was the case, I took the oath as Speaker pro tempore, and a formal resolution was prepared notifying the Senate and the President.

Mr. DYER. Is that the idea now, that the House shall elect somebody for 10 days?

Mr. GILLETT. No; this order authorizes the Speaker to designate somebody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I wish merely to say I know it is the sentiment of every Member of the House on both sides of this Chamber that our present Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts, may not be detained from his duties on account of illness and that he may continue to present himself in his customary fine fettle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GILLETT. I ask for the immediate consideration of the order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the order, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Speaker may at any time during the present month name a Member to perform the duties of the Chair for a period not exceeding 10 legislative days, who shall have authority to sign bills and appoint select and conference committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the order presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is that the Speaker or the Speaker pro tempore?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the order as presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The order was again reported.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection, I think possibly there ought to be added to the order "and which designation is hereby approved by the House." I offer an amendment to that effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Add at the end of the order the following: "And which designation is hereby approved by the House."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the order as amended.

The question was taken, and the order as amended was agreed to.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the election of Mr. CULLEN, of New York, to fill a minority vacancy on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and Mr. MCCLINTIC, of Oklahoma, to fill the minority vacancy on Election Committee No. 1.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the election of certain Members to fill vacancies upon committees, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KITCHIN moves the election of Mr. CULLEN, of New York, to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and Mr. MCCLINTIC, of Oklahoma, to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Elections No. 1.

The question was taken, and the nominations were agreed to.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a privileged report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 480.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12775, being a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916. That there shall be not to exceed six hours of general debate on said bill, to be confined to the subject matter of the bill, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from California, Mr. KAHN, and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. DENT. That at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read under the five-minute rule. That during the consideration of the bill the House shall meet at the hour of 11 o'clock antemeridian. That at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendments the bill shall be reported to the House with amendments, if any, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the following amendment: Substitute in line 8 the word "ten" for "six." I will say when this rule was proposed it was understood by the Rules Committee that if the chairman of the committee and the ranking member of the minority desired more time it would be granted. They have informed me this morning that it would be necessary to have 10 hours for general debate. I ask unanimous consent to insert the word "ten" in place of the word "six" in line 8.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I had hoped we would be able to get the consideration of this measure without practically two days of general debate. My experience is a long general debate does not shorten the time for the consideration of a bill ordinarily. I ask the gentleman from California if it is essential that there shall be as long as 10 hours' general debate?

Mr. KAHN. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I have requests for six and a half hours' debate on my side.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Upon the bill itself or upon other matters?

Mr. SNELL. The rule provides debate shall be confined to the bill itself.

Mr. KAHN. My requests are for debate on the bill.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman no doubt knows that a good deal of time will be needed to satisfy the membership of the House that the bill ought to be passed in its present form.

Mr. KAHN. Well, I suppose all bills that come in could not be passed exactly in the form in which they came in. The membership of the House is allowed to offer amendments, and I hope that in the general debate we may explain many of the provisions of the bill about which the Members may be in doubt.

Mr. DYER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly

Mr. DYER Is it the intention of the chairman of the committee to make points of order against everything that is subject to the point of order in trying to amend the bill and make it so it will be a real bill?

Mr KAHN This is a reorganization bill, and anything that is not germane I certainly shall make points of order on.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentlemen would talk out louder.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Alabama how many requests he has for time, and how much time those requests cover?

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman that I have requests for at least three and a half hours from minority members of the committee itself, and in addition to that I have requests from at least 8 or 10 Members on this side who are not members of the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Who desire to discuss the bill?

Mr. DENT. Who desire to discuss the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we frequently start out with many requests for time on a measure, on which remarks are to be confined to the measure only, to discover as the debate goes on that gentleman conclude they do not care to speak. It seems to me if we are to spend 10 hours in the discussion of this bill on matters relating to it the discussion should be pretty broad so as to embrace all subjects that in any wise relate to the bill or military matters generally. As a matter of fact, if the debate is to run for 10 hours, I do not think it should be confined to the bill. Of course the gentleman in charge of the bill can first grant time to those who desire to discuss the bill, and any time remaining within 10 hours, it seems to me, should be allotted to those who desire to discuss other matters.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. GARRETT. I simply wish to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that this was a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MONDELL. That is, the amendment?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; with the understanding that if the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] should desire this additional time and should agree upon it it would be inserted as 10 hours, and that it should be confined to the bill. The resolution as presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is precisely the resolution which came to the Committee on Rules and which limited debate to the bill. Now, we do not wish to extend the time for general debate in order to talk about matters other than the bill, and it was represented to us that 10 hours was desirable in order to discuss the bill itself. Of course gentlemen will know it provides for not exceeding 10 hours.

Mr. SNELL. If it is not necessary to use all of that time, we will get through quicker.

Mr. GARRETT. If it is not necessary, naturally the bill will be taken up under the five-minute rule at once.

Mr. MONDELL. In view of the statement just made by the gentleman from Tennessee, I do not feel that I would be justified in objecting, but I do regret that we are to spend so much time on general debate on this particular measure. There are a number of gentlemen who desire to discuss other matters, and if they could have been accommodated within 10 hours it would have relieved the situation somewhat. Spending 10 hours on this bill is giving a good deal of time. However, under the circumstances, the agreement having been made with the Committee on Rules, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Can I ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] a question? The Ways and Means Committee was hurriedly called together on Saturday, and I was informed that if we would change the foreign-relief bill, which the committee unanimously reported out several weeks ago, that the Rules Committee would immediately report a rule for its immediate consideration. I understood that we were to take that up this morning the first thing. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming, the majority leader, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], who is on the Rules Committee, what has become of that proposition?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, I have no knowledge whatever of the understanding or the arrangement to which the gentleman refers. I know nothing of it. I have not been consulted in regard to it.

Mr. SNELL. I can say to the gentleman from North Carolina that this is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we had about 15 or 20 minutes in the committee on it, and it was stated by the chairman that if we would change it and make the relief 5,000,000 barrels of flour instead of $50,000,000, which the corporation now has on hand, the Rules Committee would report out a rule at once.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, for the purpose of asking a question, and I think I shall object unless some arrangement can be made, there are some of us who would like to get a few moments of time to talk on something outside of this bill, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming when some of us can get an opportunity to have a few moments to discuss other matters?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, as I can answer that, as I do not control the situation in regard to debate. I preferred to have the debate in connection with this bill of such a character that the gentleman could get in, but I would suggest to the gentleman that inasmuch as the Committee on Rules has agreed to confine all the debate to the bill, and there is a desire to do that, it would be better to have the arrangement stand, in the hope that before long the gentleman may be able to secure time.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. POU. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wyoming, the majority leader, if it would not be possible, in view of the fact that all of Saturday was consumed in useless debate, that another day might be set apart for similar debate as was held here on last Saturday? It might be the steering committee would order the Rules Committee to report out a rule setting aside another day, and give gentlemen an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. There may be some gentlemen so constituted as to think that a waste of a billion dollars of the people's money and the discussion of that waste and the deplorable conditions created, was a useless matter, but it seems important to most people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask some one if this resolution means to dispose of Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. SNELL. I can say to the gentleman it does not.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that unanimous consent be given to increase the general debate from 6 to 10 hours. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to make this inquiry, whether the debate under this request is going to be confined strictly to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is provided in the resolution; that it is to be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced that there was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman can not object now. Unanimous consent was given.

The SPEAKER. House resolution 480 simply makes it in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes."

In other words, it is a general amendment to the Hay Act, which was passed in June, 1916. As I understand, this bill does not make any material change in our national establishment. It simply provides for changes in detail, which lapse of time and experience show us are necessary to be made at this time. It is brought in here under a special rule for the reason that it is absolutely necessary definitely to provide for the Regular Establishment before the general Army appropriation bill can be presented to the House.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. In a second. This comes with a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman understand and say that that is the intention—that not only during the time that we have general debate on these two days but on other days when we are to consider the bill under the five-minute rule the House shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. SNELL. That was the intention.

Mr. WINGO. Commencing to-morrow, then, we begin at 11 o'clock and meet at 11 o'clock as long as this bill is under consideration?

Mr. SNELL. As long as this bill is under consideration. Now, does the gentleman from North Carolina desire some time?

Mr. POU. I would like eight minutes.

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina eight minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I really may not need the five minutes. I wanted to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] a question. As I stated a moment ago, the Committee on Ways and Means was hurriedly called together on Saturday to consider a revision of the so-called foreign-relief bill, which had been reported out a month ago unanimously, appropriating $50,000,000 to relieve the starvation and hunger in Austria and Armenia and other suffering peoples of Europe. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, whom I have always found to be most reliable in any of his statements, stated to the committee the object of the meeting, to wit, that the Committee on Rules had signified to him its willingness to report a rule out immediately if we would amend the so-called relief bill by substituting for the $50,000,000 specifically 5,000,000 barrels of flour, and it was stated, the evidence before the Committee on Rules showed, that the Grain Corporation had 5,000,000 barrels of flour on hand which was a clear profit in their dealing in and selling wheat to foreign countries; that this was flour that could not be sold or disposed of in the United States because it was of an inferior grade and the people of the United States demanded a better and higher grade of flour than that, but that it could be used for the purpose of relieving hunger and preventing starvation in certain parts of Europe just as well as the highest grade of flour. The committee unanimously, in deference to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the chairman of the committee, and in view of his statement as to the conduct of the Committee on Rules, did so amend that bill—in fact we wrote the bill—proposed a new bill carrying out exactly what he told us the Committee on Rules favored. We were assured by him that if we did report it out the Committee on Rules would report a rule for its immediate consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. We did report out that bill, and I was curious to know what has become of the assurance given to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means by the Committee on Rules that if we did this, they would give us a rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me state that since the committee reported out the first relief bill unanimously a month ago at least 20,000 people have died of hunger and starvation in the very countries which this bill was aimed to relieve.

Mr. MADDEN. Did not Mr. Barnes say that, as the head of the Grain Corporation, he has the power to sell this flour without any action on the part of Congress?

Mr. KITCHIN. I was not present when Mr. Barnes appeared before the Committee on Rules, but I understand that he expressed the opinion that it could be construed that he really had the power to dispose of it to such countries; and if Congress would not give him the power to do it, if he could not get the sanction of Congress, rather than see human beings in Armenia and Austria and other countries dying daily, starving, when the corporation had this inferior flour which could not be disposed of here, he would take the chance of selling it or disposing of it to them on some terms.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to know where the gentleman got his information that 20,000 people had died of starvation?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have seen it mentioned in the newspapers, and I have received circulars, which have been sent out to that effect.

Mr. CALDWELL. I wrote the gentleman a letter that covered that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I saw the letter to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will wait one minute, I will show that 20,000 have died.

Mr. KITCHIN. Secretary GLASS told us a month ago in his testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means that a gentleman of high reputation had come to his office and told him that he happened to drive by automobile only two blocks in a city in Austria, and along those two blocks he saw 27 dead men, women, and children, with their clothes on, that had actually perished from hunger.

Mr. KEARNS. Where was that?

Mr. KITCHIN. A city of Austria, near Vienna, the name of which has just this moment escaped my memory.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me first make my statement.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] for a question.

Mr. KEARNS. I see from the terms of the peace treaty that Austria, where the gentleman says these men, women, and children are dying, this year is to deliver as indemnity or fine for entering the war 19,000 head of cattle, 30,000 head of sheep, and I think 25,000 hogs. Now, they are paying that this year as indemnity to the allied countries. Are we in turn to go over there with our flour and our money and pay to Austria in compensation for the things that have been taken from her? Then we are paying Austria's indemnity, and what crime have we committed?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we are not paying Austria's indemnity at all. The hogs and cattle, and so forth, that the gentleman speaks of, if that is the fact, are being forced from them at the point of bayonet, and that makes Austria that much less able to supply herself with food.

Now, I want to say to the House and to the Republican membership, and especially to the Committee on Rules and to the steering committee, that from all the evidence, unless we come to the rescue of the people in Austria and Budapest, they can get no relief from any nation on earth, because the Allies have declined to let Austria and Budapest have a single dollar. They said if you get any relief you will have to look to America for it. We must or should furnish quick relief also to Armenia.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was going to ask the gentleman if the emergency was so great, and Mr. Barnes says it is so great, why is it that he has not exercised the power and performed the duties which the law imposes upon him?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because he prefers to have the sanction of Congress, and Congress ought to take the responsibility. If he did do it without Congress giving approval you Republicans would denounce the administration for doing it and demand an investigation. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. As to what Mr. Barnes said before the Rules Committee on the conditions of Europe, as the gentleman states, the gentleman does not want to make a statement that was not made before the Rules Committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am only stating what I saw in the papers—what was stated before our committee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Barnes said nothing about conditions in Europe. He did not mention them. He simply made the request that he be authorized to sell five and one-half million barrels of flour, because it would be wasted when the warm weather came. He said he had the authority to do it, but he preferred to get the authority of Congress.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did not the Rules Committee at that time have evidence from other witnesses of the horrible conditions and the sufferings in Europe?

Mr. FESS. We did; but Mr. Barnes did not put it on the basis of feeding Europe but on the basis of saving the flour.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Diverting from the conditions in Europe, I want to get the parliamentary situation. The Ways and Means Committee amended the bill and put in the words that were wanted, with the assurance that the rule would be reported immediately on Saturday evening or this morning. If the Ways and Means Committee, by unanimous consent, report a bill with the assurance of the Rules Committee——

Mr. FESS. What assurance of the Rules Committee did the Ways and Means Committee have?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], chairman of the committee, said that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] said so. I want to ask the gentleman, when we get an assurance from the chairman of the committee that that thing can be done, what power is there in the House of Representatives that prevents it?

Mr. KITCHIN. The only power is the steering committee and the Rules Committee.

Mr. GARNER. Then, in the future had we not better get a statement from Mr. FORDNEY that the steering committee has given assurance that this rule will be reported out?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I want to say, in connection with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], that Austria was being compelled to pay an indemnity of so many thousand head of cattle and so many thousand head of live stock; I want to call attention to the fact that Germany was subjected to an immense indenmity, but has paid none of it. I dare say that the gentleman will find that to be literally true as to Austria.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, all this discussion is entirely out of order at this time, and unless there is some definite question as to this rule or this bill, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. SABATH, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. OSBORNE, for three weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. LAYTON, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

TO AMEND NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12775.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were 182 ayes and 4 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to suggest to the gentleman from California the fact that instead of giving starving Europe bread, the Rules Committee is now giving us 10 hours' debate on a military bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in bringing our Army from a war-time strength of 5,000,000 men down to the size required for the country on a peace-time basis, a great deal of legislation is absolutely necessary, and it should be enacted at this time, at any rate before the end of the fiscal year, July 1. The committee after three months of patient work has brought before the House this bill. I do not claim that it is an absolutely perfect measure, but from the amount of work and care with which it has been considered in the committee I do believe that it represents about as near a practical reorganization measure for the Army as it is possible for a committee of this House to bring forth.

In substance it provides for a peace-time Regular Army in this country of a maximum of 299,000 enlisted men and 17,600 commissioned officers. Of the 299,000 men we provide that 250,000 shall be combatant troops and 30,000 of them are to be noncombatant enlisted men. There are 12,000 Philippine scouts and 7,000 unassigned recruits, bringing the total up to 299,000 men. We have provided for a very large number of commissioned officers for this force. Our purpose in doing that fulfills several requirements, the principal one being for surplus officers to provide an adequate number for training purposes in this country. We intend to detail about a thousand officers for duties with the National Guard and other military organizations. We intend to have available for detail from 1,000 to 1,500 officers to schools and colleges, reserve officers' training camps' training units, and citizen training camps, in order to provide ample instruction for all the young men in the country who desire military training.

In my opinion compulsory universal training is undesirable at this time. With a deficit of $4,000,000,000 between the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Treasury staring us in the face for this year, with the knowledge that the initial first-year cost of training the 800,000 eligible young men would be very close to $1,000,000,000 in addition to the cost of our Regular Army and National Guard, which under this bill is estimated from $480,000,000 to $600,000,000, I am convinced that our committee has acted wisely in postponing consideration of compulsory training until another session of Congress, when we can have the benefit of more careful and detailed information on the subject.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will this provision made in this bill be sufficient to take care of these requirements of high schools where they have cadet corps established under the reserve act?

Mr. ANTHONY. In my opinion the number of officers provided for in this act will be ample to satisfy all such requirements. In fact, one of the estimates which was made to us when we were considering the bill was that it would be possible under this bill to have 150,000 young men in training in this country each year in the schools and colleges, Reserve Officers' Training Corps units, and in citizen training camps. We also provide for a large list of detached officers who are to be used for the purpose of carrying out the single list of promotions provided in the bill and to enable a sufficiently large reservoir of officers to exist, from which officers may be drawn to perform detached duties without interfering with the line troops of the Army.

I deem that it is absolutely necessary at this time to provide for a strong regular Military Establishment in this country, not for purposes of external defense or aggression primarily, but I believe that this country needs a strong Regular Establishment for its internal protection for some years to come, following this Great War, and we are providing such an establishment by this bill, sufficient to preserve law and order and civilized constitutional government.

Our second purpose is to rehabilitate the National Guard. It is well known that following the war the National Guard units were discharged wholesale upon their release from the National Army. It was never intended by Congress when it passed the national-defense act that any power should be lodged in the War Department which would enable it to practically destroy the National Guard at one blow, but suffice to say that the War Department has assumed that power, and by its arbitrary discharge from every obligation of State and national service of every unit of the National Guard which went into the Army during the war it has all but destroyed the National Guard of the various States. In this bill we are providing liberal legislation under which we hope to again build up the guard to its former authorized strength under the national-defense act, which we believe in a few years will give us a National Guard approximating 400,000 men to serve not only as a second line of defense in this country but as an efficient first line whenever called out in conjunction with the Regular Army, as was amply demonstrated in the present war on the battle fields of Europe.

It is not my purpose to go into all of the details of the bill at this time, but simply to make this general statement in regard to it. We are, as I said, vastly increasing the number of commissioned officers. We are providing for an increase of about 7,000 officers over the number authorized by the national-defense act.

One of our purposes in doing this is to take care of some of the most splendid fighting officer material that the country has ever seen, as developed by this war. We have 24,000 applications on file at the War Department from officers who saw service in this war who desire commissions in the Regular Army, and we are providing that of the 7,000 vacancies in the Regular Establishment created by this act at least one-half of that number shall be taken from those men who saw service in the National Army during the years of the war just closed.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman, if he can do so in his time without interrupting the trend of his remarks, state briefly what the bill does provide that will build up the National Guard to something like it was before?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. One of the most essential things this bill provides is to start in right at the top. We provide that the Chief of the Militia Bureau down at the War Department shall be a National Guard officer instead of a Regular Army officer. [Applause.] It has been found that with an officer of the Regular Army at the head of the Militia Bureau, instead of the bureau being allowed to be free to exercise what is thought best for the development of the National Guard, the bureau has been dominated by the purpose of the General Staff to destroy the guard, and it has been working at cross purposes all of these years. We propose to correct that evil by appointing a National Guard officer at the head of the Militia Bureau, and I believe it will go far to accomplish that purpose. Another thing this bill does is to reenact the provision of the national-defense act that provides that the General Staff will no longer serve as an operating force in the War Department. We eliminate them from the duties which they assumed during the war, not only to give advice on military matters and to prepare military plans, but they actually operated all of the bureaus of the War Department during the war, and, in my opinion, were responsible for the era of chaos, confusion, and extravagance that resulted from such domination and administration. Under this bill we divorce absolutely the General Staff from such operations and return them to their own field, to offer advice and prepare plans, and so forth.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman mentioned the fact that of the 7,000 additional commissioned officers that go into the Army after the passage of this bill one-half of them would be those men who had served in the National Army during the war.

Mr. ANTHONY. That not less than one-half should be composed of those men.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Where will the other portion come from?

Mr. ANTHONY. The other portion will come from a great many other sources. They will come from the Military Academy, from the ranks, from the National Guard, perhaps from the reserve officers training camps, primarily, the reserve officers, and of the other vacancies created Regular Army officers will be promoted to fill into them, and also they will come from graduates of technical schools.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Some of these noncommissioned officers who were given commissioned rank during the war would be given opportunity for a permanent commission rank?

Mr. ANTHONY. They would come under the provision of the bill requiring that not less than one-half of these vacancies, 3,500, must be so filled, and we have safeguarded that by providing that these appointments shall be made under regulations drawn by a board which we believe can not help but be absolutely fair in its administration. We provide that the board which shall have charge of such appointments shall be composed of three general officers of the line, of three general officers of the Staff Corps, and Gen. Pershing, the commander in chief of the Army.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Would the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House what has been done for the medical unit of the service and for the nurses in this bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. In making provision for the Medical Corps in this bill we endeavor to do the same as they are provided for under the national-defense act. We keep in force the same provision requiring 7 medical officers to each 1,000 of enlisted men. I will say this to the gentleman: Under the provision of the single-promotion list some medical officers are contending that their interests are perhaps not as liberally provided for in the way of promotion as they should be. There is some question as to that and it is my hope that it may be satisfactorily worked out in the discussion of the bill.

Mr. LAZARO. But the gentleman will admit they should have a little more authority than they have had in order to be efficient.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not say more authority. Does the gentleman mean more rank, more promotion?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are providing in this bill each medical officer shall have two years of constructive service in order to make up the time he spends in a medical college preparing for his medical education, in addition to giving him the initial rank of first lieutenant. But it does require not two years but, in my opinion, it requires five years longer for a medical officer to prepare himself for the service than for a man to go through West Point or come into the Army from civil life, and he should have the benefit of even more than the two years' constructive service, I will say to the gentleman, than is provided for.

Mr. LAZARO. Now, in regard to nurses?

Mr. ANTHONY. They have been given constructive rank in the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, the bill provides that a medical officer on entry into the service has to his credit two years of constructive service, but he is put in the grade of a first lieutenant, which, of course, may more than equal the time of five years which the other man starting as a second lieutenant often would have to serve before he could become a first lieutenant. So when we take that phase of it into consideration the period of two years as denominated by the figures in the bill does not indicate all the advantage the medical officer gets, because the passage from the grade of second lieutenant to that of first lieutenant of a line officer is frequently five years, and sometimes it has been more.

Mr. LAZARO. So the gentleman's impression is that it is a benefit to the medical man and the service?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We intended it to be so.

Mr. LAZARO. Of course, the gentleman realizes that the man in the service gets the benefit of it?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We are trying to approach it, as the gentleman from Kansas stated.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, gentlemen, during the war the administration of the Army was split up into a great number of independent bureaus and committees in the War Department for the operation and administration of the Army. That method resulted not alone in inefficiency but in uncalled-for extravagance. We are endeavoring to remedy that situation in this bill by combining and consolidating a number of different bureaus created under the power of the Overman Act into one administration, where we undoubtedly are not only going to provide for increased efficiency, but under the consolidation, so far as we have gone in this bill, we are going to save by the measure from thirty to fifty million dollars a year in administration expenses alone; that is, in the overhead expenses of operating these various bureaus.

The measure does not go as far as I personally would like to see it go in this respect. We have combined the Construction Corps, Motor Transportation Corps, Purchase, Storage and Traffic, and several other bureaus and branches in the War Department and restored them where they were before the war, where they belong, under the administration of the Quartermaster General, and by such a consolidation we will show an economy of from thirty to fifty million dollars a year. In my opinion we should have gone further. This bill provides for a separate Finance Corps, and yet there is no question that by also consolidating that corps with the others it will further save the country $3,000,000 a year, which is the price which must be paid for the administration of this corps as a separate branch. In making such a remark it is not my intention to cast the slightest aspersion upon the gentleman who is the head of that corps, Gen. Lord, who is a very efficient officer, as are his men under him; but it can be conclusively shown that the duties of that corps can be just as well performed in the consolidated establishment under the same officers and save the country $3,000,000 a year by so doing, and I believe it is the duty of this Congress to go further along the line and consolidate and include that with the others.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. HAWLEY. When the gentleman refers to this matter of $3,000,000 he refers to the salary cost of that department?

Mr. ANTHONY. The salaries of officers and men and the salaries of the clerks necessary for its administration.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would not there be a balance on the other of the benefit of a separate effective finance officer and corps in looking after the contracts and administration and an expenditure that might save the Government a great deal more money than $3,000,000, which they cost?

Mr. ANTHONY. It might, but it has not been shown that they have ever saved any money. It is merely a useless extra cost.

Mr. HAWLEY. No such audit has been had——

Mr. ANTHONY. There is only one auditor—the Auditor for the War Department, who really audits the bills, and, in my opinion, this additional audit is unnecessary and an additional expense.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman's proposition is really the establishment of a sort of budget system in the War Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it simply means we create a separate corps of officers and men and clerks to make out checks instead of the Quartermaster General's Department. Let me go further and show the gentleman how this multiplication of separate activities works.

Under the division of these bureaus and activities during the war it meant that at every one of the posts and camps in this country, where before the war one quartermaster officer used not only to look after construction and after the supply of the troops, and used not only to pay the men and all the bills and to look after the transportation, both horse and motor, and all that, in place of that one officer you have about seven there to-day. You have a motor transport officer, a quartermaster officer, and a finance officer, and so forth. They are standing in each other's way to-day, with nothing for them to do, where one officer could just as well do the work. That is the situation. At Camp Sherman, Ohio, as developed by a report from there the other day by an officer who analyzed the Government expense bills there for one month and showed an absolute unnecessary expense in overhead at that one camp alone of over $100,000 per month that could be saved by consolidating these various bureaus and functions and all the clerks and appurtenances that go with them. We are trying to do that, in a measure, in this bill, only, in my opinion, we do not go far enough.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman call attention to the provision the committee has made in the bill for a representative in the financial department, to be drawn from some other unit of the Army, in small encampments and smaller places?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that could be done.

Mr. MILLER. Is not provision made for it in the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think so.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. While the gentleman is discussing the various bureaus I would like to ask what provision has been made for the quick expansion of these bureaus in the event of an emergency?

Mr. ANTHONY. The only provision that is made for their quick expansion will be that we trust the department will select competent men to put at the head of them, because, in my opinion, the personal equation is the main question involved. It is the personal capacity of the men at the head when the crisis comes. We are going further, though, and consolidating all the purchases for the Army under a civilian head in this bill. We are creating the position of Undersecretary or Assistant Secretary of War, who shall have charge of all the purchases and the business of the Army. We superimpose him over all these different purchasing bureaus, and we hope through him we will secure the long-sought-for business efficiency that in some way some Army officers seem to lack, notwithstanding the fact that they have other splendid qualities.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think that with the construction work as a part of the Quartermaster General's office and not a separate and distinct bureau, it could be just as rapidly expanded for emergency purposes?

Mr. ANTHONY. Just as rapidly expanded in time of emergency. Before the war the Quartermaster's Department, having charge of construction, did efficient work. Of course, no peace-time organization can fill all the demands that come with a world war and the raising of an army of 5,000,000 in place of an army of 100,000 men. There is no organization that can stand up against such a test as that, but we believe we retain the principles of these different bureaus by this consolidation. We take them with the same head, the same organization, simply reducing them in size and grouping them under one administration to save overhead expense. That is what we are doing in this bill, and in time of emergency there is no reason why they can not be expanded and thrown wide open.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. WELLING. I notice in section 2 of the bill there is no provision for a Transport Corps as at present organized.

Mr. ANTHONY. We take the Motor Transport Corps and consolidate it with the establishment of the Quartermaster General as it was before the war and as provided in the national-defense act.

Mr. WELLING. Does the gentleman think that will contribute to economy?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it will contribute much to economy. I have the figures here——

Mr. WELLING. I will be glad to hear that some time during the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not get those figures now. But I will say to the gentleman that it will save several million dollars per annum to the Government.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Speaking of the undersecretary that has charge of the purchases, what would be his relationship to the different departments, namely, the Quartermaster General and the Chief of Ordnance?

Mr. ANTHONY. It means that all the purchasing officers of the department will report to this undersecretary of war, the Assistant Secretary of War, who shall be in entire authority over all purchases and business transactions of the Army. Instead of going up to the Chief of Staff, as is now the custom, and the Secretary of War, the reports of the Quartermaster General, the records of the business operations of the Chief of Ordnance, and all that, in regard to purchases, will go direct to this Assistant Secretary of War in charge of purchases.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the Assistant Secretary of War be in office during peace time as well as in war time? Will he be a permanent officer?

Mr. ANTHONY. He will be a permanent officer of the department.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In the event of war, would there be any addition to his department?

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course, it could be expanded; but we do not believe there will be any unnecessary additional organization. In my opinion, one of the drawbacks to our operation during the present war was that we expanded too far. We created too many bureaus, too many separate committees at the War Department, in charge of the business at the department, until we reached the point of absolute confusion. We went too far in that respect.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think I agree with the gentleman in some respects, but the thing I had in mind particularly was that I frequently heard it said during the war that the great difficulty with the Ordnance Department and with the Quartermaster General's Department was the fact that we were suddenly thrown into a situation where it became a great proposition, and that we had military men at the head of those departments, and what we needed was the business force of the country at the head of those departments. Is this supposed to cure that?

Mr. ANTHONY. We do attempt to improve such a situation as that by the putting in of this civil officer at the head of all these purchasing bureaus. Let me say to the gentleman that the bringing into the military service of this great number of "big-business" men during the war was, in my opinion, anything but a success. Some of the most conspicuous failures in the War Department were the representatives of "big business" that were put in charge of military bureaus down there. The Regular Army officer, who has had his training not only as to military methods, but combined with the business training that his work gives him, is, in my opinion, far more efficient than the average civil business man for the performance of Army duties.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I agree with part of that. I do not know whether I agree with all of it or not.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I understand this bill takes from the General Staff duties that it has heretofore performed. Does it reduce the personnel of that staff proportionately to what it was before the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it does not. It leaves them, I think, about 99 men.

Mr. KAHN. Ninety-three men.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If they have less duties to perform, why should they not be reduced?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. The scope of the General Staff was necessarily enlarged by this war. The training and planning work of the General Staff alone is enough to keep the staff busy for years to come. With the assimilation of thousands of new officers who will require years of training yet before they reach the perfection we would like to see them attain, the General Staff will find its hands full. We do turn the General Staff back to the duties prescribed for it by the national-defense act, and we eliminate from it absolutely the work of administration and operation of the general affairs of the Army.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question about the Transport Corps. Is it the purpose to eliminate that entirely, and not have a corps at all?

Mr. ANTHONY. Under the construction given to the language of the bill the Motor Transport Corps will be removed in a body into the Quartermaster Corps. It will function practically as it does now, under the same head. Gen. Drake is at the head of the Transport Corps now. We provided three brigadier generals in the Quartermaster Corps. It is the intention that Gen. Drake shall be one of these. The only thing that will happen to his organization will be that it will be cut down in proportion to the peace-time strength as provided in this bill, and his superior officer, whom he reports to, will be the Quartermaster General. In other words, the papers in his branch will clear over the desk of the Quartermaster General.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman does not think that the Quartermaster's Department might regard it as they did before the corps was established and when we had motor vehicles simply as subsidiaries instead of what has now become a great means of transportation, and not give it the attention that it might have if it were kept separate? What does the gentleman think about that?

Mr. ANTHONY. I say it all depends upon the personal element involved. Just at this time we happen to have a highly efficient man in the office of Quartermaster General.

Mr. DONOVAN. Gen. Rogers?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, Gen. Rogers; one of the best business men and best officers I have ever seen in the United States Army.

Mr. DONOVAN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. With such a man in that place of responsibility, I do not think there is any doubt about an efficient and economical administration of all these various activities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the salient features of this bill are: It is an amendment to the national-defense act and therefore does not change the fundamentals of our Military Establishment, even though it makes some radical departures; it prescribes the total enlisted and commissioned strength of the Army and leaves the minor details to experienced officers; it places one man, namely, the Assistant Secretary of War, at the head of all procurements for the Army; it reorganizes the National Guard and gives it an executive head who will be in sympathy with the growth of that organization; it provides for one-year enlistment for soldiers; it provides for the single list of promotion for commissioned officers; it prescribes limitations on the General Staff and does away with the unlimited power now held by that organization; it creates a separate Air Service and separate Chemical Warfare Service; it makes permanent law what all loyal churchmen want, that there shall be one chaplain to every 1,200 men in the Army; these besides many other changes which I have not the time nor the opportunity to mention.

Prior to the enactment of the national-defense act there had been but little change in the Military Establishment for more than a decade; the organization was based on conditions that existed during the Spanish-American War, and as a result many abuses had crept in, and we had a War Department inefficient, not because of the lack of a capable personnel but because the system was so cumbersome that it could not function properly. After the European war broke out and when it became apparent that the United States would in all probability be involved, it became the duty of Congress to provide for our military organization in order that it might be prepared to meet any emergency. As a result the national-defense act was enacted into law. It is undoubtedly the most efficient military legislation that ever passed the Congress of the United States. Since, however, our War Department had expanded but little during a period of 20 years or more, many of the features of the national-defense act were experimental in their nature. It was untried when we became engaged in the great conflict, and as a matter of course many defects were discovered in its operation. The national-defense act was never intended to fix the permanent organization of the military forces of the United States. It was largely a war measure, so it therefore became the duty of your Committee on Military Affairs to draft a measure that would provide for the permanent Military Establishment. After a careful study it decided that the better way to fulfill this object was to amend the present law rather than to draft a new one, and that is what this measure does. It contains some radical departures from our present law, but the fundamentals remain the same. In other words, it has been the aim of this committee to retain all of value in the national-defense act and amend it so as to obliterate the defects.

This measure does something that was never before attempted in a military bill. It absolutely prescribes the number of commissioned and enlisted men that shall compose the Regular Army. Under this bill the total enlisted strength will be 299,000 men, and the commissioned personnel will consist of 17,820 officers. This is the first time in the history of the Army that any Military Affairs Committee has stated definitely just how many men may comprise the Military Establishment of the United States. Heretofore there has always been an "if" attached to every bill. As a result no committee has ever been able to compute the annual cost of maintaining the Army. Our personnel has been variable, and our appropriations had to be the same in order to meet any possible contingency. Under this bill we will know just exactly how many men we can have and just how much money it is going to cost us to maintain the same. If we accomplish this one object, it will be a notable achievement. While the total strength has been designated, the bill provides for a flexibility of the various organizations which will correct a long-standing defect. Hitherto all measures passed by Congress have made a definite provision for the organization of the various branches and tactical units. The number of units have been designated and the number of enlisted and commissioned men for each unit have been prescribed. No allowance was made for the changed conditions that might occur, and thus we had an Army so organized that it was impossible to meet any emergency that might arise. The present law does away with all this.

It places this power entirely in the hands of the President, and he may change the various organizations as conditions might demand. A simple illustration will emphasize the point. We have a regiment stationed in China and another on the Mexican border. The duties of the regiment in China are largely administrative, and the duties of the regiment on the Mexican border are largely that of guarding our frontier. In order to properly perform the work many more officers are needed for the regiment in China than are needed with the regiment on the Mexican border. But under the present law the number of officers and the number of enlisted men composing each regiment were necessarily the same. As a result the regiment in China does not have sufficient officers to do the work and has a surplus of enlisted men, while the regiment on the Mexican border has more officers than are needed and is short of enlisted men. Under this measure, however, the President of the United States may assign as many officers as he sees fit to the regiment in China, and he may assign as many enlisted men as he sees fit to the regiment on the Mexican border, providing, of course, that he keeps within the limit prescribed by the bill. Thus you will see the bill gives the Military Establishment the right to use its officers and enlisted men where they are most needed. It provides a workable organization not bound down by the ironclad rules that have hitherto made our Army so cumbersome and so hard to function.

It is true that the number of officers is increased over those prescribed in the national-defense act. This is occasioned, however, by the fact that the number of officers in the Army has steadily decreased in proportion to the enlisted force, and we are only now building our commissioned personnel to its former status. In 1850 the Army of the United States was composed of 10 commissioned men to every 100 enlisted men; in 1854 this was reduced to 7 commissioned officers to every 100 enlisted men; in 1874 this was increased to 9 commissioned officers to every 100 enlisted men; in 1898, during the Spanish-American War, the number of commissioned officers was decreased to 4 officers to every 100 enlisted men; in 1903 it was again increased to 6 commissioned officers to every 100 enlisted men; and in 1917 at the outbreak of the late war the number of commissioned officers in the United States Army was only 3 to every 100 enlisted men, while at the present time the number of commissioned officers is 4.26 to every 100 enlisted men. Under this bill the number of officers will be 6 to every 100 enlisted men. You will see, therefore, that we are only increasing our commissioned personnel to the status that it occupied in 1903, and that there will be fewer commissioned officers in proportion to the number of enlisted men than occurred in the Army on various previous occasions; thus while it increases the commissioned personnel a small percentage over the present number, under this bill everyone can be utilized in the place that he is most needed; while under the old inflexible method we had officers in some of the units who were superfluous, while other units were sadly lacking commands.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

I wish briefly to call your attention to another notable feature in this bill, and that is the one on page 14, section 5A, which provides "that in addition to such other duties as may be assigned him by the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War, under direction of the Secretary of War, shall be charged with supervision of the procurement of all military supplies and other business of the War Department pertaining thereto." In my judgment this one section, if enacted into law, will result in the saving of many millions of dollars to the Government. Our present system of obtaining supplies for the Military Establishment is one of the most inefficient and cumbersome methods that could possibly be conceived. It is wasteful, extravagant, unbusinesslike, and demoralizing. Hitherto each bureau of the War Department has been bidding against another bureau where the needs were identical. Instead of having one big business organization working in unison, we have had in this one department of the Government several minor organizations, each competing with the other in order to obtain supplies; none of them cooperate with the other in securing the same, and all of them buy without any consideration of what might be obtained from the other branches.

How long would a big department store in any of our busy cities last if each department was bidding against the other for the supplies it needed? Would anyone consider it a good business proposition if such a thing should occur? But that is just exactly what has been taking place in the War Department. If the Ordnance Department needed supplies for its men it went out into the open market to compete against the Quartermaster Department for the same. If the Engineer Department needed material it went out into the open market and competed against the Quartermaster Department for this same material. One was bidding against the other. If the Cavalry had an excess of a certain article and the Infantry was in need of that article it did not transfer from one department to the other, but the Cavalry procured what it needed while the excess in the hands of the Infantry was allowed to rot or depreciate in value. Thus you will see that a condition was created in the various departments of the Army that resulted in a large additional expense to the Government. Under this section of the act all this has been obviated. The Assistant Secretary of War is the chief through whose hands must go all the purchasing of these military supplies. He will be able, and should be able, to know just exactly what is on hand in the various departments. If one department has an excess and another department a deficit of the same material he has the authority to transfer the supplies needed from the department who has them to the department who has not. The necessities of the department will be procured in bulk.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman designate how the Assistant Secretary is to be appointed? Will he be of the Regular Establishment or a civilian?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He wil be a civilian, appointed by the Secretary of War, just as he is now. He will really be an Undersecretary of War.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is there any arrangement whereby in the handling of supplies there can be any more expeditious method of settling claims? For instance, I have a minister in my district who paid for some supplies at a sale made by the Quartermasters' Department last spring. He paid by check, and it was turned over to the officer in charge, and he held that the bid was not high enough to allow it to pass, and he turned the money into the Treasury, and the purchaser can neither get his goods nor money without an act of Congress. I have had the matter up for months, and this morning I got a notice to the effect that it would require an act of Congress to get that $4.80 out of the Treasury. Are we going to obviate that sort of thing in this bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. Practically every Member of Congress has had a similar experience. We think this bill will obviate that trouble.

The Secretary of War can buy the iron, steel, clothes, food, and fuel for the entire Army and distribute them as he sees fit. In giving him this power he will have the advantage of procuring in large quantities; there will be a unity in procurement and there will be no competition in the Army organization.

It will also be the province of the Assistant Secretary of War to expand and develop our great arsenals, and I think it is the greatest factor in our military progress. Approximately all of the necessaries of the War Department can be manufactured in our arsenals, and this can be done approximately 40 per cent cheaper on a labor and raw-material basis than it can be purchased in the open market. Also, while we are securing the supplies for the Military Establishment much cheaper than we could by buying the same, we are developing our arsenals so that they will be at the highest point of efficiency in case of emergency. The Assistant Secretary of War under the wide latitude given him can manufacture in small quantities all the latest designs in warfare. He can keep abreast of the times, so to speak, and have on hand a nucleus from which could be developed in a short time all the necessary modern implements of war. It is my opinion that the Assistant Secretary of War should, as soon as possible, manufacture and keep on hand all the necessary machinery, tools, jigs, dies, and so forth, that we would need to supply private industry if it suddenly became incumbent upon it to turn out its maximum capacity of war supplies. Under this system also each arsenal will keep employed a considerable body of men who will become efficient in their work and a great Government asset if an emergency should arise. I believe too much stress can not be placed on this development of the Government arsenals, and I think it should be clearly brought to the mind of the Assistant Secretary of War that he not only has the opportunity but it is incumbent upon him in his official position to see that the arsenals are properly developed as here outlined.

This bill provides for the complete reorganization of the National Guard and gives it the place in the great citizen soldiery of the United States to which it properly belongs. The departure from the national defense act is very radical, in that it places as chief of the National Guard a National Guard officer. This was done to stimulate interest in the organization and do away with the sentiment that the National Guard hitherto has had no opportunity to assume its proper position in the Military Establishment of the Government. Prior to this time the Chief of the Militia Bureau has been a West Point graduate, an officer who has viewed the National Guard through the perspective of the Regular Army officer, and, rightly or wrongly, it has been the general belief that the National Guard has been retarded in its development on this account. With this provision the chief executive of the National Guard will be a man who will be in entire sympathy with this organization and, therefore, give it an opportunity for utmost development. While the chief is a militiaman, however, the assistants in his office will be Regular Army officers who will be acquainted with all the tactical information necessary, and thus, while the guard will have at its head a man who is in sympathy with its development, it will also be supplied with all the detailed information required in order that it may assume its proper position.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. How is this chief selected?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He is appointed by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. By and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or without?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. With confirmation by the Senate. It is an Executive appointment.

The purpose of this act is to provide a small standing Army sufficient to provide for the ordinary military needs of the United States, a National Guard that can be depended upon for a strong second line of defense, and an enlisted Reserve Corps which would be a large reservoir of trained men sufficient to meet the needs of any emergency. With this object in view, the National Guard was reorganized as provided in this bill.

The President has the power to designate the location of the divisions and the different tactical units. An incentive is offered to every young man in the United States to be a member of this organization. The bill provides for a three-year enlistment and training that will give every young man the necessary military information vital to him in time of a conflict. At the same time it gives him that freedom of action that could not possibly be provided for any man who enlisted in the Regular Army. It is the happy medium between unpreparedness and militarism, and in my opinion it is one of the most important provisions of this bill. After the young man has served his enlistment in the National Guard he is given an opportunity to enlist in the Reserve Corps, and by this proviso the guard will retain a large proportion of its men to be utilized in case of necessity. The bill also provides for adequate compensation for the officers of the National Guard and makes an incentive for these men to become proficient along military lines. Another very important provision is the one which provides for the permanency of the organization. The present war only emphasized the temporary organization under which the National Guard was constructed prior to that time. When the former enlisted force of the National Guard was drafted into the Regular Army the Guard was entirely obliterated, and when our demobilization was completed we awoke to the fact that we had no citizen organization. Under the present measure the soldier who enlists in the National Guard and is called into the Regular Army in time of emergency reverts back to his former organization after the emergency is over. I apprehend that under this measure the National Guard units will be organized in practically every town and hamlet in the United States, and that within a few years we will have a citizen organization that will be ample provision in any contingency that might arise.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the time that the National Guard man serves in the Regular forces during combat be counted in the three-year enlistment in the National Guard?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly; I yield to my colleague from Iowa.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the bill limit the number of men in the National Guard in each congressional district?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is no limit as to the number of men to be in the National Guard. Of course, that is regulated by the national-defense act, and the minimum is supposed to be 800 men for every Representative or Senator that we have. That was to be filled up by annual increments of 200 each year from passage of act in 1916. The only limit is as to the appropriations both by the National Government and by the States. The States always provide the armories.

Mr. RAMSEYER. So that the limitation on the growth of the National Guard will be the appropriations by Congress and those that the States are willing to make for that purpose?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. That is all the limitation there is.

The bill, with a few necessary exceptions, provides for single-line promotions in the commissioned personnel. There has been no more needed change in the War Department within the last 20 years. The present system of lineal promotion is detrimental to a well-balanced military establishment. The personal equation is too strong a factor in the problem. Under the present plan an officer's promotion depended in a large measure on the expansion of that branch of the Army to which he was attached. As a result every officer had an eye single to the expansion of the organization to which he belonged, usually to the detriment of some other branch of the service. The effect of this condition has been to create jealousy in the various branches and to bring pressure to bear upon Congress to expand certain military units out of all proportion to their importance. Under the proposed plan no officer can derive personal benefit from the expansion of any particular branch. It will be to his advantage to see that the entire military organization has a normal growth and that each department assumes its proper position in the military unit, for his promotion will not depend upon the growth of any one branch but upon the growth of the entire Army. If this section is adopted, we will not in the future, as we have in the past, be compelled to witness the spectacle of Army officers bombarding the Members of Congress in an effort to have that particular branch of the service to which they belong given special preference simply because such preference means that they are going to receive a higher rank thereby.

A separate Air Service is established in this bill, and the initial steps are thereby taken giving to that branch of the service its proper place in the War Department. The Air Service is yet in its infancy, and I have no doubt but what it is capable of wonderful expansion. My personal opinion is that the creation of a separate service as herein provided should be followed by the bill which will create a department of aeronautics and place the entire procurement, designing, and manufacture of aeroplanes under a civilian head. I have already introduced a bill to that effect in Congress, and I would request that at your convenience you give it your careful attention with a view to develop aeronautics.

This bill places the Chemical Warfare Service in a separate bureau, and I think this should be done. Chemical warfare is a child of the late war and, while it is yet in its infancy, it was clearly demonstrated that it is one of the future factors in any great conflict. There is no other branch of the Army that has greater possibilities, possibilities that no one can foresee. If we are to keep abreast of the world in military preparedness, we must develop our Chemical Warfare Service. Not only can it be developed as a destructive branch of the War Department, but can also be developed as a constructive feature of the Government. I have been reliably informed that experiments are even now being conducted at our big Chemical Warfare Service plant in Edgewood which give great possibilities to revolutionize not only our present mode of warfare but some of the peace-time pursuits. For this reason I deem it advisable to give Chemical Warfare Service an opportunity to expand.

Your committee decided that it would be unwise to incorporate universal military training in this bill. In my judgment, it was a wise decision. No satisfactory universal military training system has yet been advanced either by the Members of Congress or by the War Department. All have been more or less speculative in their character. An estimate of the expense attached to these proposed bills has varied from $130,000,000 to $1,300,000,000. I think the decision to appoint a committee which will investigate thoroughly and present some concrete measure to your committee is an excellent idea. Universal military training is a question that, if enacted into law, will change the entire military policy of the United States and necessarily the policy of the War Department. In my opinion, a measure of such importance should not be tacked onto this reorganization bill, which is simply an amendment to the national defense act. It should be presented to Congress as a separate measure, so that it can be considered solely on its own merits. The highest officials in the War Department have advised that even if universal military training were adopted as a policy of the Government at the present time, it could not be placed in operation before 1922 or 1923. By the time we could actually carry out the provisions of any measure we might pass now, conditions might so change that the bill would be impractical. It seems to me, therefore, that any universal military training policy that the Government might decide upon should be enacted into law by the Congress which sits in session immediately prior to the time it is to be placed in actual operation.

Section 27, page 38, of the bill is one of the most important clauses in the entire measure. It goes a long way toward solving the problem of military training. The section is very brief. It provides as follows:

> Hereafter original enlistments in the Regular Army shall be for a period of one year and of three years at the option of the soldier. Reenlistment shall be for a period of three years.

In brief, this section provides for one-year enlistments, and it eliminates the enlisted Reserve Corps of the Regular Army. Under this provision any young man in the United States may enlist for a period of 12 months and then return to private life. The result of this feature, in my opinion, will be that a very much larger proportion of the young men of the United States will seek military service in the Regular Army. Heretofore anyone who desired to become attached to the Army had to tie himself up for a period of three years of active service, with the proviso that he might be called upon at any time for four years longer. In other words, he was practically bound by his military pledge for the period of seven years. No young man with any ambition would subject himself to such a condition. The result has been that instead of the ranks of our Regular Army being filled with young men we have had in most all instances the minimum instead of the maximum quota. Indeed, it has been a deplorable fact that the various units in our Army have been skeleton units, a paper Army, so called, and rightly named because we could not secure the required number of men. Now, however, with the prospects of one year's military training and no strings tied to the same, an inducement is offered for the youths of the land to secure military training. With this increased enlistment and short-term service there will constantly flow back into private life a large body of young men who have had their year's service, become trained soldiers, and who will form a large reservoir of military trained men who can be called upon in any emergency. That my predictions will come true is clearly demonstrated by what has occurred within the last year. If you will recall, last year a clause was passed which provided that one-third of the Army could be made up of one-year enlistments. As soon as this became generally known there was immediately a large increase in the number of enlisted men, a very large proportion of which enlisted for one year. In fact, this reached its maximum last January, when the number of one-year enlistments became so great that the entire quota had been secured under law, and the result was the War Department could accept no more for the short period. Immediately following enlistments decreased a very large per cent, which was a practical demonstration of the fact that men will enter the Army for a short period, but will not obligate themselves for a period of years. I have no hesitancy in saying that if this measure is properly operated, in a few years a very large per cent of our young men will have had a one-year service and will have become trained soldiers.

We have no way of making any accurate estimate, but it is fair to assume that a minor proportion of these one-year enlisted men will decide to make service in the Army their vocation, and will therefore, upon the termination of their first enlistment, reenlist in the Army. Thus, besides building up a strong military reserve, this system will have the advantage of providing for the Regular Army a large number of young men who desire to continue therein from choice. It is only fair to assume that these men will be able to form the backbone of our enlisted Army, and they will provide the necessary number to keep that organization to its maximum strength.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit right there to another question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; certainly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is the one-year enlistment absolute or at the discretion of the officer?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If a man wants to go in, he comes under the other regulations. He can go in for one year or for three years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And then at the end of that year——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He can go out.

Mr. RAMSEYER. How long does he stay in the reserves?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He is not in the reserves. He can enlist for three years or one year, but he can not reenlist for one year.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If he serves three years or one year, he can not reenlist except for three years?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; in either case. If he serves for one year, he can not reenlist for one year.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DONOVAN. I understand by the provisions of the bill that if a man enlists for one year, if he reenlists it must be for three years. If he reenlists again, the third reenlistment, that must be for three years.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Every period of enlistment is for a period of three years.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; all reenlistments are for three years under this bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. What impelled the committee to put that limit of reenlistment at three years? It would seem that if men are allowed to enlist for one year, that it would be of benefit to have the reenlistment for one year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think the gentleman from New York is absolutely right; having had some experience in getting one-year enlistments I think we have taken an advanced step when we put it in the bill as it is, and I am satisfied. The gentleman will remember that we got in one-third of one-year enlistments a year ago. I understand that the Regular Army is averse to a one-year enlistment. They fight it, and they have always fought it, because they do not believe in it. In doing this much the Military Committee is not following the advice of the Regular Army; they are trying to take an advanced step and to see how it works in filling up the Army.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If you allow men to reenlist for one year, your chances to keep the force up to its standard would be materially enhanced.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is it not easier to get men to reenlist for one year than for three years?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think so.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understood the gentleman to state that the officers of the Army have always opposed one-year enlistments. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not believe, from a purely military standpoint, that the position of the Army officers as to one-year enlistment is sound

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. If we are going to have an efficient Army, we can have a much better one if the men serve three years than we can if they serve one. Is not that true?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think it is; I do not agree with the gentleman and never have on the one-year enlistment.

Mr. DONOVAN. The point raised is a very interesting one, and I was wondering whether a one-year enlistment was upon certain grounds. I was just conversing with one of my colleagues, and he said that he understands the theory is that the Regular Army being now the object of the bill, they want to educate and train as great a number of men throughout the country as possible, and the one-year men will come in and pass out and new men will come in, and therefore a greater number of men will be trained.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the idea of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAWLEY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. During the Napoleonic wars, Napoleon, after having crushed Prussia, prevented Prussia from having a larger standing army than 20,000. In order to train as many men as possible, Prussia called a new set of men to the colors every six months. Is not that true?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. It was Stein who used the plan at that time to train all Germans, although he could only train 20,000 at one time.

Mr. KNUTSON. And in a few years she regained her military prestige?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why would not that same system work in this country?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It would. The idea is not new at all.

Briefly I have outlined the more important measures contained in this bill. It is not a perfect piece of legislation. If conditions were different there are some features that I would eliminate and some to which I would add. This, however, can be done from time to time as our military policy develops, and it can be done much more efficiently then than now. This bill, however, is constructive. It is a long step forward in the development of a well-balanced and efficient War Department; it gives opportunity for those new features of warfare that were discovered in the late conflict to expand, and it stabilizes the military system on which our War Department is founded. I wish also to point out to you what will occur if this bill is defeated. The War Department at the present time is functioning almost entirely under the draft law which was passed May 18, 1917, the Overman Act, and the act of last September allowing the President to retain temporarily 18,000 officers. Very soon after peace is declared these acts, on account of their temporary nature, will lapse and the War Department will then necessarily function under the old national defense act. If this bill fails of passage there will be no separate Air Service, there will be no separate Chemical Warfare Service, there will be no separate finance department, there will be no efficient National Guard in the United States, there will be a very inefficient and badly demoralized Transport Corps, there will be no one-year enlistments, and the Army will revert back to the skeleton organizations without sufficient number of enlisted men to function; in fact, there will be no Army. Should this bill fail to pass the General Staff will occupy the same position of absolute power as it does at the present time. The various bureaus instead of being allowed to function properly, as they have been under peace-time rules, will be still restricted to war-time practices. If this bill fails of passage the whole fabric of our military policy will be demoralized. I can not therefore urge upon you too strongly to support this bill and see that it is enacted into law.

The principal argument against this bill is that it entails too great an expense. I believe, however, that it calls for a minimum expediture necessary for a proficient Army. and it is more economical to appropriate this sum and secure efficiency than a less sum which would result in inefficiency only. The expense involved is only the insurance necessary for our national protection. As insurance this measure calls for one-sixth of 1 per cent of our entire national wealth. It is the price we have to pay for the protection of our property, our lives, and our national honor. Our military system is the bulwark of our national defense and on its efficiency or inefficiency we must stand or fall. In writing this measure your committee had but one thought in mind, the organization and maintenance of an efficient military system at the least possible cost to its citizens. It should, and I sincerely hope will, receive the support of every Member of this House. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREENE of Vermont having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Richmond, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 305. Joint resolution to amend a certain paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3696) to change the time for holding court in Laurinburg, eastern district of North Carolina.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 12164. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River between the towns of Pasco and Kennewick, in the State of Washington; and

H. R. 12213. An act authorizing F. R. Beals to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nestucca River, in Tillamook County, Oreg.

TO AMEND THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the national defense act was enacted June 3, 1916, and this country entered the Great War on April 6, 1917. In the short interval between June 3, 1916, and the succeeding April the country was engaged with the Mexican border troubles, which according to precedents then existing were real warfare. Of course, as compared with the later events the disturbed border conditions were too insignificant to be considered as producing war conditions. The national defense act therefore has never been really tried out as a peace-time proposition for an Army.

It served, however, an excellent purpose, and in spite of the jealousy of the Regular Army, gave us the nucleus of an Army which finally developed into a most effective branch of the service, and on the battle fields of France did glorious work.

The principles of the national defense act, roughly stated, are:

First line of defense: The Regular Army.

Second line of defense: The National Guard, consisting of State troops.

Third line of defense: The unorganized militia, which under the selective draft law were speedily mobilized.

Virginians served in all these branches, and either in the regular divisions or in the Twenty-ninth Division, formed out of the National Guard units, or in the Eightieth Division, formed from the selective draft units, rendered deeds of glory on many blood-stained battle fields.

There can be no question, as has been so often stated on this floor, that when the war broke in its fury upon this country the country was wholly unprepared for such a great emergency. The national-defense act, supplemented by the selective-draft law, could furnish us the man power, but we were wholly without the means of utilizing the man power.

We had no guns, no canvas for tents, no housing facilities, no supplies. We had a wholly insufficient number of trained officers, and, of course, the man power to a very limited number were trained.

We did not even have the raw material in supply nor the factory to convert the raw material into required product.

The whole character of warfare, too, had been changed by the methods of this war.

The aerial bomb, the poisoned-gas shell, the airship, motor transportation, the submarine, great batteries of artillery, the hand grenade, the machine gun and automatic rifle, trench tactics, the manipulation of armies of millions of men presented problems entirely new, which had to be mastered without loss of time.

Such was the situation this country faced when war was declared to exist, and I can not forbear a moment's digression to pay a tribute to the people and their chosen leaders.

When the fiery cross sped across the land summoning the manhood and womanhood to the colors the response was a magnificent tribute to American patriotism. Down from the mountains, up from the valleys, rolling over the plains, out from the crowded streets of cities and the marts of trade came the answer of an aroused democracy, as millions of men gathered to the colors and millions of women set themselves to their appointed tasks.

All were mustered into the service. The captains of industry, the kings of finance, the union labor and the nonunion labor man, the rich and the poor, shoulder to shoulder, lent every energy to the great task. I have visited the scenes of American activities, and no one without visualizing the marvelous results can form any proper conception of the work done. In the spring of 1917 America entered the war wholly unprepared; in the fall of 1918 she had crossed the sea, in spite of the submarine, with a mighty army and converted threatened disaster of her allies into a great American victory. [Applause.]

The Army, the Secretary of War, and all of his assistants are entitled to the everlasting gratitude of the American people. It has become the fashion on the Republican side to pour out virulent criticism upon the head of the Secretary of War, but criticism of the Secretary is necessarily criticism of our brave soldiers, who were charged with the duty of executing the plans of the War Department.

I know that this is the day of investigating committees, smelling committees, junketing committees of all kinds and character, and this is what the Republican leaders are giving the people instead of constructive legislation. The exigencies of a presidential election campaign demand poisoned gas, the noisy beating of tom-toms, and the smashing of stinkpots, but the more resort that is had to assaults of this kind on the able Secretary of War the greater attention is directed to the marvelous work done under his leadership. If he is to be held accountable for errors committed, he is entitled to results obtained, and above the fumes of partisan malice towers the great American victory to his credit. The able and patriotic man, who during the trying period of this war so faithfully served his people, need only to point to that as a complete answer to every detractor. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I return to the problem that now confronts this House, which is the bill for the Military Establishment in time of peace.

If we are to be given a great Military Establishment; if we introduce as a part of our program compulsory military service in time of peace, then we rob the American people of the great victory won at the expense of so much precious blood and treasure. The American people will never stand for a great professional Army, carrying a billion or more dollars annual burden on the taxpayers, with its attendant compulsory service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The gentleman who undertook to explain the bill [Mr. ANTHONY] stated that it was his understanding that this Army was not for the purpose of defending ourselves against external aggression, but it was to defend ourselves against ourselves—internal trouble.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, in that case, I think we can cut down the Army very much.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Down to 175,000, does not the gentleman think?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; we can reduce the Army, but I think we should have a nucleus around which one could be built up. I shall develop that later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman think 300,000 is too much of an Army for such a purpose?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a large army; it is certainly an adequate army. I know no distinction between compulsory service and compulsory military training. In some great quarters a distinction is made between the two, but the Constitution of our fathers draws no such distinction. The training of the militia by the express terms of the Constitution is reserved to the States, and the only other power in the Constitution is to "raise and support armies." It is under this power that the selective draft operated, and it is only under this power that an American citizen, I do not care whether he is 18 or 21, can be taken from his home and from his fireside, from his study, from his work, and be placed in a camp.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman have in mind that we have as our basic policy compulsory universal service in time of war.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman is aware of that. What the gentleman means is that he would not compel the boys or men of America to do anything by compulsion in peace times.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the people are getting mighty sick of this compulsory business of all kinds and character. [Applause.]

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman advocate some other military policy for war time?

Mr. HARRISON. No. I am in favor of military draft in war time. I am in favor of the military draft whenever war is declared, because I think a duty then rests on every American citizen to defend his country, but during the time of peace the point I am making is that we have no constitutional authority to take these men for educational purposes.

Mr. SANFORD. The point is that we shall rely on compulsory service in time of war, but must do nothing in time of peace to prepare the men to carry out that obligation?

Mr. HARRISON. My point is that we must stand by the Constitution. I admit that by taking these boys into the Army and making them a constituent element of the Army we can train them, and that is what has been done in these several bills and measures that have been proposed. I made this very point before the joint committee, and I notice that all recent legislative propositions avoid the constitutional difficulty by placing the boys in the Army as constituent elements of the same.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. As I understand, the gentleman takes the position that if a universal military training bill is enacted by Congress and an effort be made to enforce it, that it would be unconstitutional?

Mr. HARRISON. It would be unconstitutional unless the Wadsworth bill and these recent legislative propositions that are now pending were adopted; that is, putting these boys into the service. The States can enact compulsory educational laws, but Congress can not. The training of the militia also is expressly reserved to the States. Congress can only raise and support armies.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And therefore the individual and the State would be within their rights if they refused to comply with the law? Is that what the gentleman means?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; unless the youth is inducted in the Army. I will point that out. This is a feature of the Wadsworth bill which was incorporated; that is, making the boy a part of the Military Establishment. He is inducted into the service by the Wadsworth bill, and that was the proposition that was before our committee, to take these 18-year-old boys and induct them into the service.

It is true that the language of the bill is that they shall be used only for training purposes; but when you take one of these boys into the military service you subject him to military law and make him subject to every military duty. If an emergency should arise, we all know that the first thing that would be done would be to order these boys into active military duty. Gentlemen, do you suppose for one moment the young men in the camps for training purposes would, in case of war, be demobilized? They would be ordered into active service, and they would have to obey or face a firing squad. Men in military service obey the orders of their superior officers, and not legislative enactments. The President, and not Congress, under the Constitution is Commander in Chief, and these young men could be ordered, in case of war, to any quarter of the globe. The young men, too, would be subject to military law. For any frivolity they could be court-martialed. Do you recall "Hard-boiled" Smith? Study some of the court-martial records and ask yourselves if you desire to expose your son or the son of your neighbor to brutal court-martial judgments for some boyish prank. This is what the Wadsworth bill means.

The cost of this proposition will be enormous. I know that the Army statisticians are around with their figures, but no one with any common sense is going to be deceived by any juggling with figures. These young men will have to be housed, and the war cantonment buildings, unpainted, built of the flimsiest stuff, are already rotting to the ground. The reconstruction would call for an initial expenditure running into the hundreds of millions at the present cost of material and labor, and an annual outlay for maintenance of millions more.

These young men called into the service will have to be fed. We know the number of men called each year would be at least 700,000, and that a dollar a day would be a cheap sum to allow for the subsistence of each one; $700,000 a day for six months would be a meager allowance just for food. I know the Wadsworth bill fixes four months, but this is mere camouflage. Gen. March testified that, while only four months was asked, he did it for the simple purpose of getting the country committed to the policy, and then the country would be willing to see that the length of service would be adequate. I do not believe myself six would be adequate to imbue into a young man any real military spirit or discipline his character. We must reflect conditions in the cantonments will be very different in peace time from what they were in war time.

The young man who went into camp at that time was preparing for the immediate emergency of the battle field. He knew he would be called on in the near future to face danger and death and his life would be the price of his unpreparedness. In peace time the natural exuberance of youth would be rather to shirk as far as possible the drudgery and dreariness of military discipline. It would take time and patience to inculcate in him any love of a work of such a character as this, and, in my judgment, not even six months would be sufficient time. Especially would this be the case when the young man would know that the occupation was of a temporary character.

It does not mean any reduction in the Army. The testimony before the Military Committee was to the effect that the size of the Army would have to be increased in order to furnish the men to train these raw recruits, and it is admitted, I believe, on all sides that so far from bringing about a reduction of the Army, if you adopt military training you will have to increase the size of this Army. The young man would have to be clothed and his health would have to be looked after. Then, too, there would be claims for compensation for injuries sustained in the service. Any reflecting man will at once realize the immense cost of such a program and will not be deceived by figures cooked up for the purpose. When the cost of a system of preparedness is as great a burden on industry as a state of war, then a cheaper method of preparedness should be sought.

In the South we have the negro problem. I have the greatest kindness toward the negro, as all thinking southern men have. Booker Washington, their leader and father, advocated that the proper training for the negro boy was to educate him to save money and to earn money in productive work. Now, I know nothing so irresponsible as a young negro boy rigged out in brass buttons and with a gun. In communities where the negro largely predominates he would be a positive menace to the safety of that community. The South has taken hold of the negro problem with great earnestness and under a heavy tax burden in endeavoring to educate him. The negro contributes practically nothing to this burden. The southern people are desirous of extending sympathetic aid to his development along all practical lines. The existence of the South depends upon such a policy. The negro is not adapted to a military career and training along this line would utterly unfit him for the economic place he now fills. To take a negro boy from the plow or the cotton field, where he is gradually developing pecuniary independence and fill his head full of the military display and put a gun in his keeping would be a crime against him and his State.

In communities where the negro population largely predominates such an experiment would be a positive menace to the safety of that community. In rural communities, if not in urban, the question of labor has become greatly aggravated. It is all the farmer can now do, with the assistance of his sons, to keep the farm in cultivation. To take his son away at an impressionable age will greatly accentuate his labor troubles. I speak of the farmer, with whose situation I am most familiar, but I believe it will be found equally true of other callings. I well remember that when it was proposed to draft into the Army the 18-year-old boys many schools and colleges prepared to close their institutions. It is said that this military education will be of great advantage to him. In war times it may be that camp training under religious and other wholesome influences helped the young men, but I have great doubts about the camp in peace times. Near cities, as these camps are, it is more likely to be demoralizing. I never heard that a peace-time camp was a Sunday school, and I doubt if it ever will be. There is no more wholesome place for a youth to be than in his Christian American home. But if improvement of the boy is sought, give the money to the public schools and higher education for both sexes. Build good roads with it. I know of no greater evangel of civilization in a community than a good road.

Another irritating feature of the compulsory training would be the perpetuation of the local boards of exemption, with their annual irritating contests. In war these boards, assisted by local lawyers, rendered great patriotic service fearlessly and patriotically and unselfishly, but I fear the temptation of peace. When these boards get into operation in peace times the temptation will be to use the contests before them for political purposes. And otherwise it would be a constant source of irritation to try the contests in a community each year as to who should be exempted and who should not be exempted by these boards.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is peculiarly an unfortunate time to attempt such an experiment. We are facing a deficit of three to five billion dollars, with large claims by the war veterans for consideration not included. The industry of the country is carrying as great a burden of taxation as it can carry and live. We have 4,000,000 trained men in the country, from whom, by volunteering, all the trained officers for a large army can be obtained. It is not so much the trained enlisted man as the trained officer. There are on file 25,000 applications for commissions by splendid young trained ex-officers, and therefore it seems peculiarly unnecessary to saddle this extra burden on the country.

Mr. Chairman, there are many of the features of this bill I indorse. It starts basically on the right principle, and that is the amendment of the national defense act. It goes back to the principles upon which that bill was founded. I am in hearty sympathy with the provision of the bill which provides for a large number of trained officers. I believe that when the history of this war is written the errors that were committed and the losses that occurred arose more from a lack of having trained officers than from a lack of trained enlisted men.

There is some criticism that has been indulged in upon this floor upon the West Point men and the Leavenworth men and the others from special schools, but I believe when we examine into the fact we will find that the American officer, whether he came from West Point or whether he came from Leavenworth or whether he came from civil life, discharged his full duty and that he is entitled not to criticism but to the thanks of the American people. [Applause.] I know there are some of these men who did acts subjecting them to criticism, but you can not in a large number of men help finding some fools, and it is possible that some of these men did act in a foolish and silly manner, but the great number of American officers discharged a great duty to the American people. Some criticism has been thrown out about West Point men not getting to the front or Leavenworth men not getting to the front, but we all know an officer was desirous of going where military glory and opportunity awaited him and that he was detained in work that was trying and irksome in training raw material that had to be trained on this side before it was sent over.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is not it true—I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if it is not a fact—that in proportion just as many West Point graduates, regular military officers, and emergency officers went to France, and in proportion to an equal number who engaged in combat were killed and wounded?

Mr. HARRISON. I have never examined into the statistics, but I will answer for it that the American officer did his full duty wherever he was ordered to discharge it, and therefore I think that this criticism of these officers and these various schools are unjustified. I have no criticism to offer of this bill because it has a large number of unattached officers. I believe that we can secure all the benefits of military training by providing for military training in the public schools, in the military academies and colleges, and in training camps, and for my part I will always be willing to vote for a liberal appropriation. In that way we get training that will run through years, where under the compulsory military feature it is only for a few months. Then, again, the war has developed the fact that we need a number of new corps and new bureaus. Before the war, under the Signal Corps was the Air Service. Now the Air Service has far outgrown the Signal Corps. We also, in my judgment, need a construction corps, and I now ask to extend my remarks at this point to insert a letter from the Secretary of War strongly indorsing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 5, 1920.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: An examination of a bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," now pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, discloses the fact that no provision is made either for a separate transportation service or for a separate construction service. In order that the position of the War Department, with reference to these two important branches of the service, may not be misunderstood, I beg to advise you that our judgment and experience dictates the wisdom of making provision for such services.

At a very early period in the World War it became necessary to take from the Quartermaster Corps and set up these two services into separate bureaus, reporting originally directly to the Secretary of War, because of the overburdened state of the responsibilities of the Quartermaster General.

In addition to the duties of supervising the transportation of the Army, the transportation service has recently been charged by the President with the supervision and operation of the inland waterways, recently under the charge of the Director General of Railroads. This activity includes the operation and maintenance of Government barge lines on the Mississippi River between St. Louis and New Orleans, on the Warrior River from Birmingham to Mobile and New Orleans, and on the New York Barge Canal between Buffalo and New York.

It is to be noted that under the provisions of section 9 of the bill the Quartermaster General is charged (as appears at line 3, page 17) "with the direction of all work pertaining to the construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures, and utilities connected with housing the officers and enlisted men of the Army, and with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies." With this limitation of construction in the Quartermaster Corps it is apparent that it is the intention of the proposed bill that all construction, maintenance, and repair work other than housing of the Army and storing of quartermaster supplies is to be performed by the other bureaus and services of the War Department. This contemplates a return to the prewar conditions when each service and bureau of the War Department carried out its own construction, maintenance, and repair work. Each bureau, therefore, will be called upon to create within itself a distinct construction department, thereby giving encouragement to interdepartmental duplication and loss of economy.

It is therefore my respectful recommendation that in due consideration of this subject provision be made for a separate transportation service and a separate construction service in the proposed bill.

Respectfully, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not agree with the gentlemen who have presented this bill, members of the committee, as to the limitation that is imposed upon the General Staff. I think that under the provisions of this bill the General Staff can operate with just as autocratic powers as it ever did, and the only way to reach that situation is to reduce the number of officers who are to be included in the General Staff. We will have the same old thing that has been complained of here on this floor in the operation of the Army during the war by the General Staff, which not only took charge of the supervision of the various bureaus but actually discharged all of the functions of all of the bureaus, which I think would be very unfortunate. This bill creates further, in my judgment, a privileged and aristocratic class in the composition of the General Staff by limiting the qualifications of staff service without giving any other person even a look-in. The best General Staff officers that the Army ever had were men who could not fulfill the conditions which the bill imposes upon the membership of the General Staff.

I shall propose the following amendment or support an amendment of like character:

An amendment to H. R. 12775, to confine duties of the War Department General Staff to those of a general nature and to insure their not engaging in work of an administrative nature that pertains to established bureaus or offices of the War Department, and to make possible the detail of any capable officer for duty on the General Staff.

Omit so much of section 5, General Staff Corps, as is on page 10, 11, and the first 12 lines of page 12, and substitute therefor the following:

"SEC. 5. General Staff Corps: The General Staff Corps shall consist of the Chief of Staff, the War Department General Staff, and the General Staff with troops. The War Department General Staff shall consist of the Chief of Staff and three assistants to the Chief of Staff selected by the President from the general officers of the line, and 44 other officers of grades not below that of captain. The General Staff with troops shall consist of such number of officers not below the grade of captain as may be necessary to perform the General Staff duties of the headquarters of territorial departments, armies, army corps, divisions, and brigades, and as military attachés abroad. In time of peace the detail of an officer as a member of the General Staff Corps shall be for a period of four years, unless sooner relieved: Provided, That no officer shall be detailed as a member of the General Staff Corps other than the Chief of Staff and the general officers herein provided for as assistants to the Chief of Staff, except upon the recommendation of a board of five officers not below the rank of colonel, who shall be selected by the President or the Secretary of War, and neither the Chief of Staff nor more than two other members of the General Staff Corps, nor any officer not a member of said corps who shall have been stationed or employed on any duty in or near the District of Columbia within one year prior to the date of convening of any such board, shall be detailed as a member thereof. No recommendation made by any such board shall, for more than one year after the making of such recommendation or at any time after the convening of another such board, unless again recommended by the new board, be valid as a basis for the detail of any officer as a member of the General Staff Corps; and no alteration whatever shall be made in any report or recommendation of any such board, either with or without the consent of members thereof, after the board shall have submitted such report or recommendation and shall have adjourned sine die.

"The duties of the War Department General Staff shall be to prepare plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the military forces and national resources in time of war; to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the Army and its state of preparation for military operations. Not to exceed six of the War Department General Staff officers will be assigned to the duty of coordinating the work of the various established bureaus of the War Department, and none of these officers nor any other General Staff officers will be detailed to or assigned to any of the various bureaus of the War Department, but will operate as a committee of coordination."

The national defense act provided the following complement of General Staff officers: One Chief of Staff, 2 generals, 10 colonels, 10 lieutenant colonels, 15 majors, and 17 captains, of which not to exceed one-half will be stationed in Washington. The proposed bill provides that the General Staff in Washington shall consist of 1 Chief of Staff, 4 generals, and 84 officers, which is almost double the number of the entire General Staff before the war, or four times the number stationed in Washington before the war.

This excessive number can only be used for administrative purposes and for the purpose of assuming supervision over the various established bureaus of the War Department, which the bill, in page 14, tries but fails to prevent.

It is well known to the many Members of the House that the General Staff performs administrative duties and exercises supervision and control over the various bureaus of the War Department, which cause excessive duplication of work and takes away from the bureau chiefs. The most striking example is that set up in the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division, each officer actually accomplishing results and doing work is supervised by a General Staff officer, generally sitting alongside of him, tabulating what he does and checking up on him. There undoubtedly should be a committee of the General Staff on coordination, but this committee should sit together and coordinate the functions but make no attempt to harmonize them, such a detail as is at present attempted, in that they use this excuse of harmonization to actually control and minutely supervise every small purchase of operation that is being carried on.

The manner of selection of General Staff officers as written in the proposed bill would eliminate the initiative on the part of the large body of officers to become General Staff officers. The wording of the amendment throws open the door to the General Staff to every capable officer, and there are many capable officers who have not and will not have the chance to take the course in the General Staff College, as this must necessarily be limited to a very small number. Many of the officers of the Army at large have, by their own efforts, studied and prepared themselves for General Staff work, and I believe that these officers should be eligible for detail in exactly the same manner as an officer who has been given the preference in taking the course at the Staff College. The amendment makes the selection of General Staff officers exactly as it was under the national defense act, and I believe this method to be far superior to the one in the proposed bill. The method in the proposed bill sets up a board by the Chief of Staff, under the Chief of Staff, to select these officers, and it practically amounts to a class distinction requiring certain certificates of graduation of an officer before making him eligible. This is entirely at variance from the principle of this country in which we consider all men equal and any man of ability available for any position.

Why should we limit the detail of a General Staff officer to a certain class any more than we should say that a man should not be elected to Congress unless he had at first served in a State legislature, or that a man should not be elected President unless he had first been governor of a State?

I fully indorse that provision of the bill which provides for an assistant secretary and gives him charge of supervising the supplies for the Army. It seems to me that is an exceedingly wise innovation. By taking the national-defense act and making the changes which are necessary to bring the organization of the Army to the present requirements of a modern army I believe we will have all the legislation necessary. We should preserve the National Guard, aiding the States in maintaining a proper military force for the enforcing of State laws, and at the same time having well-trained troops to be called on occasion into the Federal service. The proposed bill needs amendment, but it is on a correct basis. I believe we all, without regard to party, desire to reach a proper basis for securing an army for the national defense. I propose to vote on the propositions in connection with this bill absolutely and entirely free from party bias and I believe Members are animated by the same purpose. The sacrifices of thousands of men for the country on the blood-stained fields of France are still fresh in our thoughts, and the inspiration of their example will guide us to a consideration of this bill, animated solely by a purpose to safeguard American institutions and to secure the honor and glory of the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. How much time did the gentleman use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield that back?

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield it back.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman on the other side use some time now?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read in my time the following article from the Philadelphia (Pa.) Sunday Press of March 7, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the article indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Press, Sunday, Mar. 7, 1920.]

HIGH COST OF LIVING CRACKING MORALE OF ARMY AND NAVY; OFFICERS RESIGNING.

WASHINGTON, March 6 (Special).

America's greatest military problem now is not the future size of her fighting forces, but retention of what she has.

The high cost of living, according to personnel officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, is doing to the American military forces what the German powers could not do. It is cracking the morale.

Wholesale resignations of officers in the regular service are pouring in, nearly one-fourth of all the officers in the Regular Army having submitted resignations since the armistice was signed.

In the Navy the resignations are proportionately as large and many warships are now tied up in navy yards because of an insufficient crew to take them to sea.

Resignations of temporary officers by the thousands was not only expected but desired as soon as the war ended, but no such exodus of men from the regular service as has occurred was anticipated.

Figures obtained at the War Department to-day show that there have been 2,354 resignations out of the Regular Establishment of less than 11,000 officers, and they are coming in great numbers daily.

Officers of the higher grades are not generally resigning, because the higher pay and additional allowances they receive enable them to meet the increased living expenses. More than half of the resignations from the Army are submitted by first lieutenants.

In discussion of relative rates of pay in civil and military life recently it was pointed out that the Army doctors at Walter Reed General Hospital, in Washington, were receiving less than the bricklayers at work on the hospital buildings there.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, while this bill makes no provision in itself for increased pay of officers, I think it not amiss at this time briefly to mention it specifically because of the fact that for several days statements have been made on the floor of this House protesting against any increase in the pay of the men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, in which figures have been given which are entirely misleading. The statement was made the other day that it was proposed to expend more than $80,000,000 for this purpose. I want to call attention to the fact that of the two bills which have been considered by the Senate and which have been pending on the Calendar of the House, one of them provides for an expenditure of $49,000,000, and the other, in round numbers, for $59,000,000.

Mr. QUIN. What item is that the gentleman is mentioning?

Mr. CRAGO. The matter of the proposition for increased pay of officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and of the enlisted men.

Both of these bills are based, not on any attempt to get men into the Army, the Navy, and Marine Corps, but are both based on an attempt to keep in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps the men who have been trained and have become efficient.

Now, the article which has just been read is only a sample of articles which are in the better papers of this country, from one end of it to the other. You might say that it is part of a propaganda, but when you meet these men who are affected, as you do meet them as they travel on the trains, going to and from their homes, you know that what they say is not a part of any propaganda. Only a few days ago on the train I talked with two young men who had just left their ship in New York Harbor and were going to their homes in St. Louis. Those men were skilled mechanics, electricians, on that ship. They had each spent some fourteen to sixteen years in the service of the Navy. Both of them were married. Their wives lived in St. Louis. They got the magnificent pay, I believe, of $77 per month, and each of them was going home with the intention of quitting the service, because their term of enlistment had expired, and they said that they owed it to their families to get into something where they could make two or three or four times the money. And yet these are the very type of men our Nation must have if we are to successfully operate the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not a fact that the House passed a bill raising the pay of the enlisted men?

Mr. CRAGO. Of the Navy, yes. Now, it is eminently unfair to increase the pay of a class of men in the Navy and not increase the pay of the same class of men in the Army, as the Army requires practically as many expert men in the noncommissioned personnel as the Navy.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought the gentleman was directing his remarks to commissioned officers.

Mr. CRAGO. It starts with the enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps the minute they have started up the line for promotion. For instance, the first-class private in the Army gets it. As to the cost of this, if you will repeal the provisions of the Overman Act and do away with the frills and follies which are being carried out to-day at immense cost in this country in the name of Army training, you will save two or three times as much during the coming year as it will take to pay this increase, and I am referring to the so-called war-camp activities which are going on and which cost this Government millions of dollars each year, and which are entirely unessential. They are merely carrying out some man's fad as to a particular line of training.

Mr. MADDEN. How much does the gentleman say this will cost?

Mr. CRAGO. The provision of the two bills, as I explained to the gentleman, one bill costs $49,000,000 and the other approximately $59,000,000. I refer to the 10 per cent increase for the officers and the ration increase, and the increase for the enlisted personnel.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the total was about $80,000,000 a year.

Mr. CRAGO. The figures we have from the Bureau of Finance show $59,000,000 for the one bill——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says that if the Overman Act was repealed it would save four times the amount. Does the gentleman mean to say it would save $300,000,000?

Mr. CRAGO. I think it would. But that is merely an estimate. Everywhere you go you see the immense expenditures that are being made under no other authority of law than the provisions of the Overman Act. Again, if you take the surplus material in the hands of the War Department and the Navy Department to-day and dispose of that material without thinking more of what the result of it will be on decreasing the prices on the general market, and think more of the fact that the Government needs this money, and that the goods are constantly deteriorating, you will realize more than enough in the next six months to pay all this expense. You can go to one aviation warehouse in Buffalo alone and dispose of enough surplus material, which is deteriorating more or less, and inside of the next three months, although you may break the market price on some of the necessities of life in doing that, and on some of the material that is very much in demand, you will realize more than enough money to pay these additional expenses. I want to say, that if we were right in 1908 in fixing these salaries, as we did then, we are dead wrong now in not increasing them at least 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman must realize that in the sale of the products to which he referred there would be only one saving. The gentleman proposes to continue the cost here?

Mr. CRAGO. No. None of these provisions provide for the continuance here of this rate or this scale of pay for more than one year from June 30, 1920. And if at that time it is considered by Congress that the cost of living has been reduced, and salaries are being greatly reduced in other lines of industry, I would be in favor of reducing it, because when we fixed it in 1908 we based it on the standards existing then.

Mr. BEE. As I understand it, there is nothing in this bill that provides for the increase of pay of officers?

Mr. CRAGO. No.

Mr. BEE. Has the gentleman any information as to when the Army pay bill, by which the increase will be made, will be reported?

Mr. CRAGO. I have not. I am simply answering some of the statements made on the floor of this House. As to the bill itself, I think very well of many of the salient features of this bill and of the principles underlying it. I also think very well of many of the provisions of the Senate bill, and in considering this bill many of us are constrained to favor it because we realize that in a conference between the two Houses many of the good features of the Senate bill may be incorporated in this bill, and that out of this conference of the two Houses may come a reorganization of our Military Establishment which will redound to great good to our Military Establishment and to the people of this country. In considering this bill one of the difficult things before the committee has been the fact that each branch of the service wanted special consideration. Each particular officer thought that his situation must be considered, and it has been a fight all along the line to let these different branches know that what we were after was the formation of an army which could properly function, more than we were interested in the fortunes, good or bad, of any particular branch of the Army or of any particular man in the service. That is the only way we can look at it, and that is the only way we can accomplish anything, at the same time doing what we think and know is right and best for the great majority of the men who have given their lives to this very important work.

Now, without going into the details of the many meritorious features of the bill we have framed as to the Army, I want to discuss just for a short time the provisions relating to the National Guard.

I do this because of the fact that I have had so much correspondence with men of the National Guard who have been fearful that Congress at this time would not give them a proper reorganization plan. These officers themselves differ widely as to what plan is best. The National Guard officers may be divided into two schools: Those who follow the views of the adjutants general of the different States and those who follow the views of men of the line or the staff who have branched out and given the subject of military science and military training that intense study, by reason of courses at the Army schools, which has enabled them to have a broader grasp of the National Guard problem than the mere matter of administration, which is centered in the office of The Adjutant General. In answer to many of these communications I have said that, in my opinion, Congress to-day is in absolute sympathy with the National Guard of the United States, and Congress wants to do whatever is best for this National Guard.

Now, these two schools of thought divide on the question of whether we form our National Guard under the militia clause of the Constitution or whether we do something we have never done before, except in emergencies, and organize this voluntary force under the Army clause of the Constitution. If we do the latter, this is what we can accomplish: We can put the organization, the equipment, and the training of the National Guard exclusively under Federal control, and we will still have the dual use of the National Guard; a dual use, either under certain conditions by the Federal Government or under other conditions by the State governments, and we will not confuse the organization, the equipment, and the training with the use of the National Guard of the different States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does this bill put the National Guard under the exclusive control or jurisdiction of the Federal Government?

Mr. CRAGO. No; it is still under dual control. This bill leaves it under the militia clause of the Constitution. Now, the National Guard of the States in the past war performed a wonderful service. But here are some things that happened to it, about which they are very sore, and rightfully so, to-day: Many men who may not have been fitted for active field service, but who had given years of their time and money and study and best talent to the maintenance of the National Guard, were absolutely thrown out of their organizations which they took into these concentration camps; and many men of brains, business men and professional men, who would have made splendid officers in some other arm of the service, were sent back to their homes and never recognized, while other men from their very homes were taken from the same line of business or the same profession to which these men belonged and sent into active service and sent to France, although they had no military training whatever; and these men who had given their lives to this work were absolutely ignored.

When the Government took the National Guard units into the service they weeded them out properly, but the Overman Act allowed them to ignore the provisions of the national defense act, which provided for the recruitment in each locality of a battalion for each regiment of the National Guard taken into the service of the United States. That provision was put into the national defense act looking to the very situation which occurred, namely, that you took these regiments from a certain locality. In that same locality you kept constantly organized a reserve battalion from which recruitments could be made.

Some people say that the draft act upset that. The draft act did not do anything of the kind. Under the draft act the men drafted could have been put into these battalions that were kept back for training and recruitment purposes and the ranks of the regiments at the front filled from these very localities.

What happened was this: They sent some of the recruits for these National Guard organizations right to the front line with but a few weeks' training, while in the camps of this country men taken from the very same localities where these National Guard organizations originated, who had been training for six or eight or nine months were left; but because it did not suit a certain commander to send these trained men, other men, say, for example, men from New Mexico, were taken, without experience or training, and put into a New York or a Pennsylvania organization; and you have these organizations coming back to their localities, not knowing from what State many of the men came who formed a part of those organizations.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman mean with reference to the national organizations to which they belonged?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. These divisions came back to their own States and are mustered out, and they find out that they had in their ranks men from every State in the Union.

Mr. BEE. Not from their own localities?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; and they did not have the addresses or the history of these men. They are searching the records to-day to find out where their own men belonged.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Did the gentleman hear the statement that was made before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs by Col. Donovan about replacement troops that were sent to his regiment while they were at the front? He spoke of the condition that the gentleman has just referred to.

The officers in charge of troops that were in training did not send the well-trained troops to the front for replacement, because they wanted those troops themselves, when their organization should go to the front, and instead they sent men who had not been trained more than two or three weeks.

Mr. CRAGO. That is exactly true, and that is exactly the criticism I am making now; and that could not have occurred if they had adhered to the provisions of the national defense act and had retained this recruitment battalion back home.

Mr. KAHN. And it would not have occurred if we had had universal training before we got into the war?

Mr. CRAGO. It could not have occurred.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman think it ought to have been made up of troops from their States?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. The national defense act provided for that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman allow me to make a short statement that was made to me by the Hon. J. Fred. Talbott, of our State, a short time before his death?

Mr. CRAGO. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He said that during the Civil War one regiment from Maryland was entirely wiped out, and it played such havoc through the State that the War Department wanted to avoid that very thing and not have all the men from one locality.

Mr. CRAGO. That is one argument, but that very seldom happens.

What happened in Maryland in that regiment could not happen here because some of the men we got did not have the same customs, did not have the same thoughts, did not have the same ways as these boys that went to the front. Here is a concrete example. I could not believe that men were over there on the battle front who had only served three or four weeks. I said that could not happen under our system because the men are trained here four to six months. They said it was true; they knew it. But I found they had men there sent from New Mexico who had not been in camp 10 days before they were sent to the front with an organization as quickly as they could get there, and that they had no training whatever; yet out at Camp Sherman were thousands of men from that immediate vicinity who were thoroughly trained, but they would not let them go.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That statement was made to me by Mr. Talbott who served during the Civil War.

Mr. CRAGO. Oh, yes; that might occur, but it would occur more readily in a small organization than in a large organization.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the gentleman think that officers who put men in the front ranks, men who had not been trained, ought to be court-martialed?

Mr. CRAGO. The difficulty is that you can not fix the responsibility very well. Under their system they called for so many men to be sent from certain cantonments, and it would be simply impossible to put your finger on the exact man responsible for the personnel sent.

Mr. HARRISON. The fault was not in not training the men, but the fault was of the officer who put men not trained in the front ranks.

Mr. CRAGO. The fault was in not having trained all our young men before, so that in the event of war we could have all trained men. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Would this bill obviate the difficulty that arose in my own district? They wanted a unit to remain and be retained as a unit, and the matter was taken up with The Adjutant General. He telegraphed back that conditions were such that the effectiveness of the Army could not be secured by maintaining the local unit, and therefore the unit was disorganized and scattered. Is it possible to have an effective Army and maintain the local unit?

Mr. CRAGO. It is possible, no question about that, and under the national defense act and this act it is possible; without the interference made possible by the Overman Act they could not have disrupted this organization.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I will.

Mr. KAHN. My colleague does not believe that such an organization could be kept intact all through the war?

Mr. CRAGO. I think the gentleman refers to something like this, say, "Company K, Fifth Regiment," from his State. They could keep its identity all through the war, but, of course, the men might all be changed.

Mr. KAHN. It would not be possible to maintain men in the company from that particular locality all through the war.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; if you followed the provisions of the national defense act and kept always in existence the training battalion.

Mr. KAHN. Does it not depend altogether on the casualties?

Mr. CRAGO. On the casualties and the size of the Army.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. While that is true, is there anything in military science that is opposed to taking a unit—Company K of a certain regiment or the regiment itself of infantry or a battery—and using it, at least in the beginning, together rather than scattering it?

Mr. CRAGO. That is what should be done, for that is what keeps up the local pride, carries out the traditions, and makes the strength of the Army.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. Following the gentleman's suggestion, would it not be necessary, under the policy of this bill, if we got into a war where we did not have allies—would it not be necessary to use untrained men in the front lines?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; if we had no men trained; if we neglect the opportunity of training all our young men. But now let me get at what the bill does for the National Guard. They are trying to reorganize the National Guard in different States, and they are up against some real propositions.

Now, what they are up against in reorganizing the National Guard to-day is the fact that at the end of a man's Federal service he thereby severs his connection with the National Guard, even though only half of his term of enlistment had expired. They must completely reorganize these companies. They have ruled also that organizations of the National Guard, in order to be acceptable, must consist of 100 men to each company, because they say the tables of organization for the Regular Establishment prescribe 100 men, not taking into consideration the fact that many of these companies have only from 50 to 75, 80, or 90 men in them. They require the National Guard organization to have 100 men from the beginning. Now, what happens? Our armories in the States, where they have spent on the company armories from $50,000 to $100,000 and on the regimental armories hundreds of thousands of dollars, are based on 65 men to a company. In this bill we have made the minimum for the first year 50 men for reorganization purposes, and the bureau must recognize the company when it is so reorganized. After the first year 65 men will be the minimum. I do not object seriously if it is necessary later on under the new tables of organization to increase that number. We may be able to do it later, but let us get the National Guard reorganized first.

Now, prior to entry into the Federal service this was the way the pay of the National Guard was working: If a high enough percentage of the men did not show up for drill, the captain and the lieutenants got their pay, but the enlisted men did not get any pay, because enough of their comrades did not show up. This bill reverses that and puts it up to the captain and his officers to have the men there. If the attendance of men falls below a certain mark, the officers do not get their pay but the men who show up for drill, whether 5, 10, 15, or 20 of them, get their pay, and their pay is provided for under this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. This refers to the National Guard?

Mr. CRAGO. Absolutely.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the requirement for the minimum number of men in a company in the regular service?

Mr. CRAGO. The tables of organization provide for 100 men.

Mr. MADDEN. But now they have companies with not more than 15 or 25. I know of majors who are commanding battalions of less than 100 men.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And regiments of not more than 300 men, with 3 colonels and 3 lieutenant colonels and 4 majors and 5 or 6 captains. What is the remedy for that?

Mr. CRAGO. That is hardly a matter for legislation. It is really a matter of proper administration of the armed forces of our country.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should there be so many officers when there are so few men?

Mr. CRAGO. I do not think we have enough officers, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. BEE. Following the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, is it not a fact that the difficulty is not because they have too many officers, but because there has been a tendency in this country to decry joining the United States Army, until they have discouraged young men from joining?

Mr. CRAGO. Oh, yes.

Mr. BEE. Can you disorganize your entire system of military training in order to have the proper proportionate complement of officers?

Mr. CRAGO. No; it is more important to have a proper complement of officers in time of peace than it is to have the necessary complement of men.

Mr. BEE. Even if you do not have the men for them to drill?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Who has been decrying joining the military service? I do not know of anybody.

Mr. CRAGO. I do not think the gentleman has.

Mr. BEE. I do not mean the gentleman from Illinois, unless he takes it to himself.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Under the conditions described, though, would it not be better to put the enlisted men in command and take care of the officers in that way?

Mr. CRAGO. I hardly think that would necessarily follow. The national defense of this country, in my opinion, can not rest entirely on our Regular Army. I am a believer in every citizen of our country doing his part toward the national defense, in our Army or Navy or Marine Corps, just as we do our part when we pay our taxes. Every man is subject to taxation according to his ability. In times of emergency, in times of great need of the Government, some men more able to do so or more disposed to do so may volunteer to do far beyond what is absolutely required of them in financing the Government, but there is a basis on which all must stand, and I think that is true in the defense of our country. The ideal system, to my mind, is a citizen army thoroughly trained, under the control as to its training, equipment, and organization of the Federal Government, subject to the use either of the Federal Government or of the State government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. CRAGO. We never can get the kind of citizen army, in my opinion, which we really need under a strictly volunteer system. I believe that any system of universal training which may be adopted—call it what you may—should have a provision in it that any young man who cared to serve his country in a National Guard organization rather than take his training under the Federal instructors would have his option of doing so. If you will give these National Guard officers, who by that time will have had this training at the service schools and are competent to impart instruction, the material with which to work, they will build up organizations which will be effective. I can see no reason why in any system of military instruction which we give the youth of our land we can not have that instruction in the hands of men who have made this profession their life work and still keep it democratic and free from any taint of militarism. In fact, just the opposite, we can base it on the same principles as our collegiate, academic edueation of the youth of our land is based.

The boys are sent to these institutions, and in this other training they will be sent to camps to be there under the direct control, guidance, and tutelage of instructors, who have made this training their life work; these college professors do not dictate the policy or command these boys absolutely, or deprive them of their rights, or give them this, or take from them that, because the civilian, not the educator, sits on the board of trustees of the institution and directs the policy of the institution, and any system of training which we adopt in this country could be managed on that basis by which a civilian board would operate through the men who have made military science their life work, who have made a life study of this profession, men who have made the laws of our country a study, men who are adapted to teaching discipline and respect for our institutions, and they would be the instruments by which this civilian board would conduct this instruction. When we have built up this civilian army as we can build it up, with the Regular Army as our institution of learning, giving this instruction, we will then have started on a course which will develop for this Nation of ours a force which can defy any army on the face of the earth, because the education of that Army will be in the proper spirit; and until we do that then in any great emergency we will surely be subject to the same criticism as we have had growing out of this war, where men who have given their life to this work have not been accorded the credit which rightfully belongs to them; where men have come back from the greatest service they have ever performed in their lives, utterly disgusted, complaining of the treatment they have received, when as a matter of fact they should have come back conscious of the fact that they have done everything which a citizen of a free country can be asked to do in behalf of his country. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill has some good provisions, but I am opposed to it as it is written. The Air Service is neglected; the dangerous policy of lump-sum appropriations is established; the General Staff is given too much authority, made too large, and too many of its members are to sit in Washington. Too many Army officers sit here now in swivel chairs whose main business is to "pass the buck." The bill provides for too many officers of high rank. Many of its provisions mean waste of money, which is indefensible. I wish to discuss in detail but one provision of the bill.

The construction division should be made separate and permanent. If not made separate, it should be a part of the Engineer Corps, with which it is closely connected.

Instead of consolidating commercial construction work for the Army and the operation of utilities at the different War Department properties under one head, this bill makes necessary six small construction divisions to do that character of work for the different bureaus of the War Department. No more uneconomic disposition could be made of this subject. The necessity of placing this construction work and operation of utilities under a single bureau or service of the War Department is apparent. It is evident that it should not be under a bureau that has other specialties.

This bill provides that only construction, maintenance, and repair and operation of utilities connected with the housing of officers and enlisted men and the storage and issue of quartermaster supplies shall be done by the Quartermaster Corps. It does not attempt to set up a single organization to handle the large and important work of construction, which the experience of the recent war has shown to be vitally necessary to efficiency and economy. The bill scatters the construction organization among all the various bureaus of the War Department which have such work to do, at least six in number. such as the Ordnance Department, the Aviation Corps, the Chemical Warfare Service, the Medical Corps, the Signal Corps, and the Quartermaster Corps. Each will set up its own small construction division and each maintain its own central office overhead, with the consequent expense and waste of public funds.

It is needless to argue that one central office overhead will be a great saving over six separate central office overheads for the various bureaus. A single construction service would enable the War Department to have the advantage of specialists in the various lines of construction and repair work and the maintenance and operation of utilities, whose talent could be devoted alike to the needs of the entire service for all bureaus.

If economy is to be the watchword of this Congress, it will certainly shoot wide the mark in destroying a splendid organization whose worth has been abundantly proved during the recent emergency and scattering the services rendered by that organization among six different bureaus, which must each set up its own construction division as a side issue to its other important duties. The bill proposes to set up the department of finance, which before the war belonged to the Quartermaster Corps, the Chemical Warfare Service, which before the war belonged to the Ordnance Department, because it was realized that these were matters to be handled by specialists; but when it came to the work of the construction division, which is highly technical, requiring trained specialists, and which is known to have been eminently successful and efficient during the war, it is proposed to scatter it among the various bureaus upon the ground of economy. If this silly thing should be done, it will result in inefficiency and indefensible extravagance.

The work done by the predecessor of the construction division during the 10 years prior to the war averaged in volume one-tenth of the entire appropriations for the Army. This same work will in the future certainly not be less than one-tenth of the amount of the appropriations for the Army, whatever they may be and whatever the size of the Army may be. In this very bill the Army proposed to be created will require an expenditure for construction of not less than $48,000,000 per annum. Surely sane business judgment requires the setting up of one service to handle this large expenditure which shall specialize upon the same and be organized entirely for this work, rather than to allow it to be placed in various bureaus, where it must of necessity play second fiddle to some purely technical military operation.

It is a well-known fact that the construction division of the Army during the late war at all times maintained its prestige, accomplished all of its tasks assigned on time in a creditable manner. It is clear that the credit of assembling the American Expeditionary Forces in France six months ahead of schedule was due to the speed maintained by the construction division in providing the necessary housing and training facilities on time in 1917. This division has never been investigated, has never been the target of adverse criticism, has overcome apparently insurmountable difficulties with ease and dispatch, and accomplished a task in 18 months that makes the construction of the Panama Canal look very insignificant in the light of the records established by this branch of the service.

The reorganization of the services of the construction division by providing for a permanent construction organization will meet with the unqualified approval of all the engineering societies of this country and all engineers who played such an important part in the construction program of the Army after its organization in April, 1917.

Too much credit can not be given the construction corps, and I am confident that every Member of this House who carefully studies the record of facts will cordially support an amendment to be proposed at the proper time making this division permanent. You, I believe, will support it in the interest of the taxpayer, in the interest of good business, in the interest of efficient government, and in the interest of effective and expeditious service to our country, both in time of peace and in time of war. The brilliant record of the construction division of the Army is irrefutable and convincing. This corps is the one capable, energetic, progressive, and efficient division of the Army that does the job on time and does it well. It should be made separate and permanent. The Army can not be efficiently organized without this provision. I appeal to the Members of the House to adopt the amendment making such provision. [Applause.]

Mr DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY].

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, this is not a funeral oration over universal military training, because I consider this subject far from dead, and it is my desire to keep it alive.

When the Military Academy bill was before the House about two weeks ago I took occasion to address the Members on the subject of universal military training. Since that day, February 17, the Military Affairs Committee voted by a substantial majority indefinite postponement of such legislation.

Said action was disappointing, for in my opinion a system of unversal military training is the best insurance the Federal Government can adopt against the possibilities of war, besides upbuilding and improving the health, morale, and mentality of the youth of America.

In my speech of February 17 I also advocated a progressive decrease of the Regular Army as feasible, wise, and consistent. This bill makes provisions for an army of practically 300,000 men and 18,000 officers.

Hand and hand with universal military training should go a small Regular Army and a great economical saving would ensue.

In my opinion it would be a fatal error to reduce our officer strength, for if we have learned any lessons from the World War we now must appreciate the great demand for officer material in an emergency.

As I pointed out in the House two weeks ago, the average cost of the soldier to-day is $1,750 per year, including overhead charges, as against $1,000 per year per man five years ago.

If we provide a progressive decrease of the Army from 300,000 to 150,000, taking $1,500 per year per man as a basis, since we do not provide for a decrease in officers, we could save 150,000 multiplied by $1,500, or $225,000,000, and my figures furnished the Members of the House February 17 from the head of the finance division of the War Department showed indisputably and incontrovertibly that the incorporation of universal military training into our Military Establishment in the fourth year of its induction, after the machinery had been organized and was in active operation, would cost the Government less than $135,000,000. Therefore, having a small Regular Army combined with the citizen-soldier proposition, the United States could save about a hundred million dollars a year over the present policy as outlined in the Army reorganization bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The gentleman has given us the benefit of his information in respect to the Army as proposed by him. Can he give us the figures, the amount of money it would cost to maintain the Army under this bill?

Mr. OLNEY. I have incorporated all these figures by tables as furnished me by the head of the finance division, and it is in the RECORD of February 17, 1920, in very comprehensive form.

In lieu of writing a section in this bill providing for universal military training the committee voted to appoint a committee to study the question and report its findings to the whole committee at a subsequent date to suit its convenience.

Five years ago in this Chamber we listened to speeches both for and against preparedness. A conspicuous and able Member of Congress in 1915 was the late Maj. Augustus P. Gardner, and well do we recall his sounding the alarm to a Nation unprepared and unpreparing for war. He was ever preaching for a larger Navy and a bigger and more efficient Army, and he was right, and while his exhortations fell on deaf ears, he was largely responsible for our efficient Navy when we entered the war. Five years ago, while Gardner and KAHN were trying to enlighten Congress as to the imperative needs of the Army and Navy and to goad it into action, other Members now in this Congress, contemptuous of their warnings and arguments, smiled placidly, relied upon blessed security, and openly stated in debate that the United States could never become embroiled in the Great War. We did get into that war, at great cost to man and woman kind and to the Public Treasury, and I venture to say if we had been ready we would have emerged from the war with half the life and money spent which it cost us in the end.

For this very reason I am in favor of a policy which will train half a million young Americans a year. You would be considered careless and neglectful indeed if you failed to insure your dwelling house against loss by fire. Therefore, why should you fail to insure your country against destruction through war. Universal military training is the best insurance you can take out for Uncle Sam, and we shall never consider our labors at an end in Congress until we write such a provision into military law, and then, and only then, will we have provided for our Republic one great democratic army, fed, nourished, and propagated by one great reservoir, the 48 States of the Union, a national asset and a national necessity.

Although an ardent advocate of universal military training, I am not blind to the pending appropriations, which are enormous, urgent, and absolutely necessary, and therefore postponement of such remedial legislation is feasible but should become effective July 1, 1922, although such provision should be written into law at our earliest convenience.

Doubtless the teeth of Germany are drawn for the present, and crippled as she is, with her former allies, she offers no immediate menace to civilization, but, gradually renewing her commercial prestige, she is also maintaining and supporting an army of four to five hundred thousand men, and, with an adequate navy in the future, her ugly head will rise again some day to challenge and threaten the world peace, and we must not be caught again unawares asleep over a volcano.

In conclusion, it seems to be the opinion of the friends of universal training that a test vote in this House would result in its defeat of 3 to 1, and it perhaps is the better part of wisdom to have the policy studied and investigated and a report on the findings submitted to the Members at some future convenient date rather than to have a knock-out blow delivered at once to so important and necessary an adjunct to the national defense.

As far as I personally am concerned, I am as strong in the faith as when advocating the idea five years ago, can never change my spots, and will always be found on the firing line loaded, primed, and ready to offer battle for universal military training.

Mr. Chairman, in the remainder of my time I desire to say but one or two words. At this time, however, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a letter written by one McGuinness, of New York, to the New York Sunday Tribune, in which he proposes a substitute for a bonus bill. It is a relief proposition, and I believe if the Members of the House are to face any proposition to relieve the ex-service men of exigencies and urgencies in time of need, and we may have to face it, this proposition submitted by this ex-service man furnishes valuable information. It would cost the Government about a quarter of a billion dollars, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

RELIEF BUT NOT BONUS.

To the EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

SIR: The question of a bonus to ex-service men seems to be preeminently in the minds of Congress and the country in general. I think you will agree with me that the bonus is desired, not as a reward for fulfilling one of the duties of citizenship, but as an aid to those men financially embarrassed as a result thereof. It seems to me that the income-tax law offers a medium through which some relief may be granted, approximating in direct proportion to the need.

Roughly, my plan is as follows:

1. Grant total exemption to married men earning less than $3,000 and single men earning less than $2,000.

2. Married men earning over $3,000 and single men earning over $2,000 would be granted no additional exemption, but would have to pay taxes on all income above $2,000 and $1,000, respectively, as at present.

3. Married men earning less than $2,000 and single men earning less than $1,000 should be given a cash bonus of $50 annually.

4. Cripples, etc., to be especially provided for.

This plan could be put in vogue for a period of five years, or on a graduated basis of one year for each six months of service.

The merits of this plan are as follows:

1. The total cost to the Government would be within a quarter of a billion dollars, spread over a five-year period. This would cause no currency inflation.

2. The exemptions and the bonuses would be given only to the needy.

3. No examining board would be necessary to judge the applicant's claim. The income-tax blank would be the examining board.

4. The service man, having paid his taxes "over there," would not be as reluctant in accepting tax exemption as he would be in accepting so-called "blood money."

As an ex-service man and a member of the American Legion, I am opposed to any bonus plan which would inflate our currency, boost the cost of living, and eventually divide the bonus among the profiteers.

WILLIAM V. MCGUINNESS.

NEW YORK, March 3, 1920.

Mr. OLNEY. Before closing my remarks, I wish to urge upon the steering committee on the Republican side of the House and the leaders on the Democratic side of the House the imperative necessity of passing the pay bill, increasing the pay of the officers in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, pending to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken or who may speak on this bill may be allowed to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all those who speak on this bill or who have spoken on the bill have unanimous consent to extent their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that even that general consent can be given in Committee of the Whole. In the Committee of the Whole consent can be given to one individual, but not a blanket consent.

Mr. KAHN. Then I shall renew the request in the House and withdraw it at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 25 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a good bill and I shall, taking it as a whole, support it. It will afford the best legal basis that the Army has had for many years. In its general scope the legislation works over the national defense act of June 3, 1916, and brings that act down to date, adjusting it to peace-time conditions. The present act builds on a broad and permanent basis. It is no small task to work out a comprehensive plan for the present and future and to so frame the law that we shall preserve the benefit of our experiences in the Great War.

It was inevitable that in the sudden expansion of our military force to 4,000,000 men we should have indulged in much that was experimental, though in this respect we perhaps did much less than our associates.

Some of our departmental bureaus and branches were incapable of the necessary expansion to meet the emergencies of war. Their bases would not admit of it. In such case a complete organization had to be worked out and built from the ground up. Branches and elements of the service, for which no basis existed, also had to be worked out.

The task now is to reduce and in doing so to preserve the skeleton of such of these as experience has demonstrated to be practical and useful and to so provide that these branches may be expanded at once to meet the requirements of any emergency.

As to how this may be done, of course, men will differ not only fundamentally but in detail.

The committee has had these various plans and details outlined where difficulties exist and has undertaken to work out and lay down the ground plans which most strongly appeal to it as practical for the present and future.

THE SIZE OF THE ARMY.

Section 2 of the bill states the number in the Regular Establishment. The bill sets out what are to be known as the combatant arms or the line of the Army. Except in time of war, or when the public necessity demands it, the number of enlisted men shall not exceed 250,000; Philippine Scouts, 12,000; and 7,000 unassigned recruits. At no time shall the establishment, excluding the Philippine Scouts, exceed 280,000 enlisted men. The number of officers is 15,037, exclusive of the officers in the medical department, chaplains, band leaders, and professors, all as provided for in the bill.

It will be immediately appreciated that this is no small establishment. While it is about 100,000 in excess of the number provided for in the national defense act of June 3, 1916, it is but one-half—exactly one-half—the number asked for by the War Department.

The great question is, Can this force be further cut—can a further reduction be made? Some of our very best military minds place the number provided for in the bill as inadequate. The greater number, however, have expressed themselves that the number when properly and efficiently disposed of will meet all requirements so far as can now be determined. The disposition of the committee was to reduce to the lowest possible number, consistent with the safety of the country—to cut to the bone. I know there are some who will think this number too great. There are some who believe in practically no Army, at least, not an effective one.

To those who are opposed to an effective Army, I have neither the time, the disposition, nor the patience to discuss the question. In general, I fear they are those, or the successors of those, who influenced Members of the Sixty-fourth and the preceding Congresses to oppose every effort to enter upon any preparedness program commensurate with the dangers menacing the world. Blinded by prejudice, or mistaken in judgment, or by whatever course of reasoning or by whatever influence they came to their state of minds, theirs was the colossal mistake of the century. I can honor every man for his personal views if they be founded upon candid, mature reflection and faithful research—a candid, fair-minded disposition to ascertain the requirements of Government.

But the man, pig-headed and prejudiced, immune to reason, fixed and unyielding in his own ignorance of the subject matter, one who sits in bigoted intolerance of others on matters of such profound concern to the people and to the Nation, is a man to whom no Member of this House should for one moment give an attentive ear. The sooner such a man and his argument are dismissed the better. No one wants such evil counsel.

I, for one, by the help of God and the act of a free, enlightened, and intelligent people, never want this Nation in the helpless military condition it was in on the day we passed the declaration of war, April 6, 1917. [Applause.]

As direct consequence of our national failure to do anything in the way of preparing to fight the fire, which was spreading throughout the world, we waited in childlike tranquillity until the blaze was at the door.

I, for one, shall never fail in my efforts to avert a repetition of this sad, if not tragic failure. Three epochs of history are calling us to profit by our past experiences—the periods following the close of the Mexican, the Civil, and the Spanish Wars.

It is not economy to save to-day for the purpose of having a surplus to waste to-morrow. [Applause.]

National security, the welfare of our people, the stability of our institutions, our capacity to remain immune to the evil things which are sweeping over the world to-day require that we organize and maintain an adequate and instantly effective Military and Naval Establishment. [Applause.]

GENERAL STAFF CORPS.

The bill provides for an effective General Staff Corps. I am a firm believer in a strong, effective, vigorous General Staff. Without it no army, however well organized and equipped, can effectively operate. The staff is the planning section of the Army, as well as the coordinating. To give it administrative authority only as a "last-ditch" expedient would tend to throw every other administrative branch to the wind. Our experience in the late war has demonstrated beyond all possible doubt the advantages of the staff principle. When we look about to locate the force, the organization that brought about the expansion of our establishment to meet the emergency of war, the eye, as well as the hand, rests upon the General Staff Corps. It must be retained to have an effective Army.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Provision is made for the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of War, who shall be under the Secretary and shall be charged with the supervision of the procurement of all military supplies, and other business of the War Department relating thereto. This is an idea upon which there was practical unanimity.

It is the hope that in the future an experienced and capable business man will be selected for this position, and that he will not be what is regarded as a political appointment. The welfare of the service requires that there should be an element of permanency in this position. No position in connection with the entire Military Establishment is of more importance than this.

Everything relating to the supply service comes within his jurisdiction. He is the personal director or head of the business end of the Army. One of his principal duties is to keep in touch with the supply resources of the country.

Another very important provision of the bill is the finance service. This is also a creation growing out of our experiences in the late war. It shall be the duty of the chief of finance, under the authority of the Secretary of War, to make disbursement of all funds of the War Department, including the pay of the Army and the mileage of officers and the accounting therefor. The position of paymaster attached to the Quartermaster Corps is superseded by the representative of this newly created branch, though provision is made, in the interest of economy of administration, that officers outside this department may perform these duties where small units are being dealt with. This is to avoid duplication of overhead expenses.

The Quartermaster Corps, under the Secretary of War, is charged with the purchase of all standard supplies common to two or more branches of the service, and with the construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures, and utilities of the Army establishment. This corps has charge of storage, transportation, the acquisition of real estate, and other similar services.

It will be noted that the Construction Corps, the Transportation Service, and the Motor Transport Corps are eliminated.

My own personal judgment is that we have made a mistake in doing away with some of these, especially the Construction Corps. Could I have had my way I should most surely have preserved this construction branch of the Army. I can see no sufficient reason for its rejection from this act. There is no inherent relation between it and the Quartermaster Corps. In my opinion we have dropped backward. The construction branch as an element of the Quartermaster Corps is out of date, obsolete, and not in tune with the modern situation of things. If we were building a Military Establishment from the beginning, if we had never had one, and especially if construction, repair, and maintenance had never been within the Quartermaster Corps, there would have been no thought of placing it there now. It bears no inherent relation, no connection, no association, kinship, or fitness to the quartermaster. Every function is foreign. The fundamental duty of a quartermaster is to receive and distribute supplies to the Army. It should be primarily the function of the Quartermaster Corps to serve as the distributing factor of the service.

In event it should be made necessary to destroy this very efficient and valuable, I might say indispensable, service to have it absorbed, swallowed up in some other branch, my thought is that it should go into the Engineers Corps. There is something of a remote kinship between engineering and construction, but there is none, absolutely none, where this bill puts it.

Then again, "storage." What business, what necessity is there; what sense is there in placing the storage of everything in the Quartermaster Corps? In the very nature of things the storage of much of the material used in the Army should be with the branch of the service which produces or supplies that material or necessity. To illustrate, I can see no possible reason for the Quartermaster Corps having charge of the storage of arms and artillery ammunition, and so forth. That should be with the Ordnance branch of the service. The same with medical supplies, which should be in the Medical Department.

In my humble opinion we have crowded into the Quartermaster Corps duties, privileges, and functions wholly alien and extraneous. We have not only crowded it but overwhelmed it, and that too with a diversity of service wholly incompatible with the good of the Army.

The construction corps should be an independent corps functioning as such, with its own organization, its own personnel, and its own character. It should be a corps of builders. Building nowadays is a business—a remarkably technical one. It is not a mere passing trade or occupation—not in these days—and if we are disposed to apply any of the rules of business to the Army organization we should retain that remarkably efficient organization, wrought out of our war experiences, known as the Construction Corps.

The Judge Advocate General's Department is only simplified in personnel. The elaborate organization, existing during the war, is brought down to a peace-time basis.

My judgement is that some new plan or system of administrating military justice should be devised, but this would necessitate the adoption of a new military code—the magnitude and detail of which would manifestly render it impossible for this bill to contain, dealing as it does merely with the outline of the Army reorganization.

I hope soon to see the day when this entire system will be relegated to the waste pile, where it rightfully belongs. It is outgrown; it is obsolete; it is vicious. Human experience and the advance of the human understanding cry out for a change. The present system of administering justice, the methods, principles, and procedure dealing with the violators of military laws and regulations are, so far as I know, the only surviving tag-end of the Dark Ages. It is not only crude, but positively cruel, and in many cases barbarous. It is the last remaining remnant of the power of an autocracy or class, which once upon a time governed and controlled everything relating to the Military Establishment as a part of organized governments. We have outgrown the system. The world has gone on and taken everything else with it except this ancient institution, which long ere this should have eliminated from among our living methods of dealing with men. It is open to the assault of every human and modern sentiment. It is not to be wondered at that the young man of to-day, brought up as he is amid our institutions, so framed as to guard with care every right, will not freely and voluntarily offer himself into a life where this miserable system is the basis of his Government and this procedure the method of administration.

But to accomplish this our whole military code must be revised, if not completely rewritten, upon a new and modern basis. To do this would take a bill three times the length of this. Let me again say that this bill just furnishes the outline of the Army reorganization, not the forms, procedures, rules, and the myriad of details.

I am heartily in sympathy with every effort to bring about this much-needed reform. [Applause.]

The idea that the forms, procedures, and methods of two centuries ago can not be improved upon, as seems to be entertained by some, must be addressed, if at all, to the blind reactionaries, not to the living, advancing thought of the people of to-day. My suggestion is that it be not embodied in this bill wherein at best only a fragment of any modern system can be embraced and where such as there be would be jeopardized, if not positively annulled, by some obliging construction of a half-expressed plan. [Applause.]

There is a novel piece of legislation in the bill, commonly known as the "single list," for promotions. The method and manner of promotion has been the bone of contention in the Army many, many years. At some periods the methods now in force have come dangerously near affecting the morale. It seems now that the best thought in the Army is the single list, by which promotions will come equally to all branches or arms of the service. The overwhelming demand for the establishment of this equitable method at this time speaks in most commendable language of the absence of narrow selfishness amongst the officers of the Army. Many will lose files, if not grades, by the establishment of the system, but nevertheless it meets with almost universal approval.

The permanent commissioning of officers in certain branches of the noncombatant branches of the service is another piece of wise and salutary legislation.

Provision is made to continue the Chemical Warfare Service as an independent branch of the service, similar to the Ordnance and Engineer Corps. This is another wise arrangement, embodying as it does the best experiences of the war.

Nurses are given rank, but chaplains are not. This is another incongruity of this bill. I am content with the provision affecting nurses. It is well worthy of a trial. I know it is an innovation, and in the end it may prove unsatisfactory. The criticism, if any, must be addressed to the novelty of this legislation. The plan outlined here may not withstand the hard school of practical test in the service; if so, subsequent legislation can cure the error. The success of this provision will largely depend upon the course and conduct of the benefited members of this branch. In its permanent attachment as a unit to the service it will in the last analysis have to stand or fall upon the success or failure of its personnel in the new situation. I hope it will not be a misfit.

As to the chaplains, I can not agree with my distinguished colleague on the committee that they should have no rank. We can all philosophize, we can discuss, reflect, ruminate, if you please, regretfully or otherwise, but, after all, we must come to the conclusion by acknowledging that rank does count in the Army. True it is that the post of chaplain has no counterpart or similitude in the service. His position is distinct, it is individual as a class, it is personal. The chaplain's power for good lies in his personality. He is the sole exemplar of peace, mercy, and good will amongst men in an institution founded and maintained for enforcing law and rule by force and often by violence. But his function is not so paradoxical as it may seem. He is a wonderful power for good. The pages of history are brightened by the records of his noble acts. The roll of honor in the late war contains the names of too many self-sacrificing patriots, who bore the cross upon their shoulders instead of the bar, the leaf, the eagle, or the star, not to do all respect and reverence to the bearer. The chaplains have had Army rank for years—ever since we have had an Army—and it should not come to us now in the face of their wonderful service in the late war to deny them what I believe is their due.

The provisions of the bill relating to the National Guard, I believe, will be found fairly, if not entirely, satisfactory to the guard. It is by far the best law, so far as putting the guard forward to where it belongs, of any act ever presented to Congress. In incorporating these excellent features the committee simply is reflecting the unanimous opinion of the officers of the Regular Army in their estimation of the National Guard as a national military asset. Unstinted praise came from every source, and for the first time in many years the guard is weighed and appreciated at its true worth. [Applause.] The committee, therefore, was of the opinion that now was the opportune time to place the present and the future of the guard in the hands of its friends—something never done before—by providing that the Chief of the Militia Bureau shall be appointed from among the officers of that body who have served in the guard as a commissioned officer at least 10 years.

Seemingly I have criticized this bill as much as I have commended it, but criticisms demand enumeration. That which meets the approval, like the many thing which are good, generally passes without special mention. So it is with this bill. The many, very many good features so far outstrip the weak, the bad ones, that I even hesitate to critically scan the handiwork of the committee in which I performed so humble a part. There are other provisions I should very much like to discuss, but I must desist lest I trespass further upon the time of my colleagues.

Of my colleagues in this very important committee—few, if any, there are in the House that surpass it—I can say their sole motive in formulating the bill, with all its varied and in some respect novel features, is, and at all times was, the welfare and the good of the service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I can not vote for this bill, but I admit that there are some very good provisions in it. In my judgment, for a peace-time Army the Hay bill—the national-defense act of 1916—is the best measure that has ever been written on the statute books of this Republic. To that measure three amendments should be added, and that should stand as the peace-time Army Establishment of the United States of America. The measure before you, gentlemen, is the camouflaged General Staff bill that retains their full authority. In my judgment, the people of the United States do not need, do not demand, and do not want a great standing army. The ideals upon which our Republic stand really abhor the idea of military force in peace times, and yet gentlemen on this floor, like my able and genial friend from Washington [Mr. MILLER], who just addressed you, believe that this Republic ought to have a powerful standing army.

For what purpose? Did he tell us why we need this great establishment of which he speaks? Has he told you or anyone else why he believed in this idea of compulsory military service that he has been advocating in this time of peace? It is rather peculiar that since the armistice was signed, on the 11th of November, 1918, some people have advocated the greatest military establishment that the United States ever had and the biggest navy that floats the sea. The same people advocate a League of Nations, which, we are told, will cause us to disarm and to need neither soldiers nor war vessels. Can you arrive at by what kind of a process of ratiocination these gentlemen can reach such conclusions? To my utter surprise, the Secretary of War and the General Staff came before our committee soon after the armistice and wanted 576,000 soldiers. And gentlemen rushed in with forceful compulsory military service bills in time of peace. They even fooled the Secretary of War and had him advocate that nasty military mess before the Military Committees of the House and Senate, a thing he has opposed all his life, so far as I know, up until after we whipped the Germans.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I can not.

The Secretary of War wanted compulsory military service after we had crushed that system in Prussia by forcing the Germans and all their allies in the war to ground arms on November 11, 1918, and while the League of Nations was being formed. And I observe in the press that the Secretary of the Navy, my distinguished friend, Mr. Daniels, has been before the House Naval Committee and wants the greatest Navy that floats the seas. He wants 30 warships in an additional program now after we have whipped the Germans.

Whom is it we want to go out and fight now? Here we have been supposed to be the apostle of peace—the United States of America, with all her splendid citizenship, with her splendid clergy of all denominations, with the greatest churches of the earth, having their foremost exponents in every State of the Union, with the religion of our Lord and Christ, the sacrificial cross that stands before us all, and yet we have this horrid doctrine urged upon us by Members on this floor and by others in high authority. Why is it? Is it possible that I am behind the times? I am a young man. I have come up from the humble walks of life, through hardship, toil, and strife, and, God being my judge, every pulsation of my heart is honestly for the benefit of the poor of the human race. [Applause.] And neither by prayer nor by study, nor meditation, nor from history or the prophecies can I reach a conclusion that this glorious Republic, which I love, should go back on its history, back on its ideals, and found an autocracy built upon the force of militarism. And yet that is what is confronting the American people to-day. And why is it that men who are not influenced by that propaganda can reach the conclusion that after our brave boys have gone on the battleships as sailors, after they have gone as soldiers, wearing the uniform of this Nation, and have demonstrated to the world that a great united country of 110,000,000 people can almost over night prepare its young manhood and gather up its husbanded resources of gold and can gather all the implements of peace and prosperity and mold them into war implements to destroy property and human life—why is it that any of our statesmen can believe that it is necessary to change our history and our traditions, and enter on a policy of the very thing that we declared war to overthrow, and organized the resources of this country and armed our young men to crush from the face of the earth? We can not fool the American people. Neither can we tamper at this period and juncture with such a dangerous foe as militarism.

Our people realize that the armed forces of the Kaiser, trained through this process of universal militarism for a period of about 50 years, was the real cause of this awful war that caused so much sorrow and death and destruction of property in the world. Yet we have good, sensible statesmen who stand on this floor and advocate it. Is it possible that my friends believe that with Germany disarmed, subjugated, with a great war debt that she must pay, with the Czecho-Slavs helpless, with Russia in the jaws of the Bolshevists, with Italy over there on the point of starvation almost, with money values gone down to less than 50 cents on the dollar, the franc in France, the lire in Italy, the mark in Germany, and even the English pound sterling away below par, and the Russian ruble worth almost nothing, with disaster all over the world, with the people trying to come back—is it possible that statesmen propose to set up an enormous Military Establishment in the United States?

Is it for the purpose of frightening the world and having the whole world believe that the United States of America is a great roaring lion going about seeking whom he may devour? Surely statesmen do not believe there is any danger of that poor fellow over across the seas, that can hardly get enough to eat, raising a great army and financing himself and prosecuting a war against America, when he can not pay his debts now. Surely statesmen do not believe that there is anybody going to come down here from Canada. Surely the statesmen who are advocating this huge standing Army and the greatest Navy that the world ever saw must realize that because of war there has already been imposed on the backs of the American people $35,000,000,000 in bonds, Treasury certificates, and other securities, thrift stamps, and war savings stamps, bearing interest from 3½ per cent to 4¾ per cent. With those heavy obligations confronting us, these gentlemen advocate keeping up the greatest Military Establishment ever known, which will be an added and continued burden that will work an irreparable injury upon the finances of this country, as well as on the morals of the people.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield, although I would like to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. QUIN. They advocate this, notwithstanding the fact that we must get out of this debt that this war has put us into. They are talking "economy" in one breath, and the next moment they are coming and advocating the very thing that will make our expenses more than we can bear.

Let me ask you, gentlemen, who is to pay this enormous debt? It is true we are collecting enormous sums of money through income taxation and excess profits taxation from the rich of this country. Yet it has been necessary to reach out to every walk of life and tax the humblest citizen all that he can stand. And I want to say to you, gentlemen on that side of the House, that the only taxation that I ever heard of Republicans taking off since you came into power was the tax off soda water and ice cream—and I voted to take it off—to be paid by the poor little children that would go up to the soda fountain and drink; but some of you thought hard of it, and you turned right around and put a tariff on the buttons that the poor people wear, so that you do not deserve any credit for doing it. [Laughter.]

You are not trying to reduce taxation when you come up and advocate schemes and policies that will draw down harder on the backs of the people. In the last analysis who is going to pay all these war obligations? You do not get this money alone out of the pockets of the rich. The man who has great sums of money coming in from incomes does not miss it so much. But do you know that as far as possible those who are gathering in excess profits on incomes pass the tax on to the consuming public? It is the man in moderate circumstances, the man who earns his living in the sweat of his brow, who, in the last analysis, must pay most of this war debt that we have on us now.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. QUIN. A further thing is that these gentlemen are going to put their money into United States Government bonds.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield. Scheming financiers and their politicians are in favor of freeing these bonds from taxation in order that the men who control the great wealth of this Republic will escape all of this immense war debt, and this future taxation that you propose to impose in order to pay for this large Army and Navy is to be put on the backs of the poor men and women of the United States who earn their living around the desks and on the farm and in the workshop or on the railroad trains or in the mines or in the sawmills and elsewhere. You need not endeavor to fool yourselves into believing that while we are making the people of large wealth pay all these expenses every man who has as much sense as a green lizard knows that the wealthy classes of this country are smart enough to make every effort to control legislation and, if possible, get the bonds of the United States finally exempted from taxation, and the bulk of wealth of this country, controlled by the very rich people, will be made free of taxation.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. QUIN. I would rather not; I would love to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. QUIN. And knowing at the same time that the plain people of the United States will be forced to bear the burdens of this war which our people so vigorously and patriotically prosecuted and won. And as for this so-called "preparedness" in time of peace, after we won the war, is it possible that if the League of Nations is the great panacea for war and is to stop all men's minds from going in the wrong direction, the American Congress will still go ahead with a great Military Establishment and this huge Navy that the Secretary of the Navy is talking about? Who is going to believe that it is necessary? [Applause.] When the Germans get ready, and get paid all their debts and war indemnities, and get themselves back where they want to be, they may go back over there and fight the French and try to take Alsace and Lorraine again. Everybody who has been over there has formed an opinion. Do you want to bind our young manhood and go over and fight for France? There may be a little war coming over there about Fiume. Do you wish to go to the farms and muster an American army and go over and fight for the Jugo-Slavs, or the Russians, or anybody else? I do not. Then let us pursue a course which will preserve peace by turning away at every point from all tendencies to militarism.

Our people in the future will determine the policy which they desire this Government to pursue. Our people do not believe in imperialism. The masses will not stand for that horrid doctrine. If the United States Government is going to continue to be a Republic of the people; if this Nation is going to stand for high ideals, to stand for the church of the living God, to carry the torch of liberty on land and sea, to stand as an exponent of a free people, we must continue with the best ideals for which this Republic has stood. We can not carry that doctrine to the world if we have a soldier strapped on the back of every laboring man and farmer in the United States. You can not carry that doctrine to the world if you are going to have a testament in one hand and a rifle or a sword or a package of dumdum bullets in the other. This Republic can not be both flesh and fowl. If it proposes to stand for the people, it must stand on that kind of a platform every day in the week and every night in the year. It can not advocate one policy one day and shift to another the next day. Our country can defend itself, as it has demonstrated in the past, whenever it becomes necessary to do it.

With this national-defense act that we have on the statute books, that so soon as peace is declared becomes automatically the law of the land, by adding the chemical-warfare provision to it and something for the flying part of the Army, and by modernizing the articles of war so that they are no longer a relic of barbarism, we will have this country ready for any emergency. Our manhood does not need to be drilled by training for two or three years in the Army to go out to defend our Nation. The great standing army of Russia, that was so long the pride of the Czar, is where to-day? Bolshevism is running wild and rampant. The Czar's head is cut off, and he is laid away in his grave, and even the innocent members of his family are there. That is what a great standing army did for him and for Russia. And here in the United States, with 110,000,000 people, with practically no Army, our people have continued free and happy, and there is prosperity all the way from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific, from the Gulf of Mexico clear to the Canadian border, our ships plying on the seas carrying commerce to the nations of the earth, the fine cotton grown in the South carried across the sea and our wheat carried from the granaries of the West to feed the starving peoples of the world. Everywhere the American flag is respected and honored, because they know this is not a selfish Nation, not based upon force, but a Nation that stands for honor, justice, and liberty to all the peoples of the world. The national-defense act gives us all the Army we need—175,000 men, with about 11,444 officers, and can be built up at the order of the President when an emergency arises to 400,000 men. Does any man in the United States believe this Republic would be in danger with that splendid law that is so elastic, with good, well-trained officers? The National Guard under that act is properly cared for. The national-defense act, I believe, keeps in the city of Washington about 57 officers as members of the General Staff. There ought not to be over 35 or 40 of them, for the actual good of this Nation. Thirty-five or 40 members of the General Staff kept in the city of Washington to make plans and to advise are for the best interests of this Nation.

I believe in highly educated Army officers. Among those men we have patriotism. You need not doubt that. Occasionally we have some selfish man in that organization, as we do in all other walks of life, but as a general proposition they are honest, good, patriotic men. I will say that it ought to be further amended by adding a provision in this particular bill under discussion that the Chief of the Bureau for the National Guard should be from the National Guard of some State of this Union. With our Military Establishment properly cared for under the provisions of the national-defense act with modernized articles of war, under which brute force and barbarism will not govern the trial of officers and men, our Republic will be safe. Nobody need fear that anybody will ever run over the people of the United States.

But some folks say "we must have compulsory military service," and even the majority of our committee voted that in. But after this vote they heard a still, small voice. That night it made them have a vision, and the next morning they marched in, and in a low voice they said, "We will bury this compulsory universal military training feature." [Applause.] Now, why was that done? Oh, the mockery and sham of it. They knew the American people would not stand for that abomination. They knew the Republicans in this House would vote them down just like the Democrats did in their caucus. They knew they could not add that enormous expense to this Government now. They can camouflage figures. Although some people say figures will not lie, you know the man can lie who makes the figures, and that is what they are doing on the cost of this thing of compulsory training or compulsory military service, or whatever you please to call it. It is a very costly experiment. They realize that if they once get the nose of that camel inside the tent they are going to have the camel clear inside with a whole lot of kids around it in a very short time. Why, under that bill my friend from California [Mr. KAHN] would have all these niggers down in Mississippi and the South gathered up out of the cotton fields and grain fields where they are making food and clothing for the world, and it would send these Senegambians into a camp to educate them to be military artists and soldiers. Why will you take these laborers away from their work?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I would love to, but I have not the time.

Mr. KAHN. I wondered if that was the Senegambian in the woodpile, why the gentleman is against military training?

Mr. QUIN. I would be against it if there never was a nigger in this country, because I love the people. I do not propose in an independent, free Republic to make slaves out of the young men. Whenever you take a young man from the farm or the workshop or school and put him into a military camp in the Army for three months or four months or six months or two years, eight times out of ten you unfit that boy for the balance of his life for the work that he is cut out to do. You ruin him as a farmer. He does not want to go back to hard work again. That boy will want to sit up in an office and draw about $200 a month for doing nothing. You can not take these young men away from the schools to which they are going, and away from their work, whether it is in the shops or in the stores or on the farms, and expect them, after they have a taste of idleness, after they hear the music of the military bands in the camp, after they see the fine-looking officers with shoulder straps—you can not expect them to be willing to go back to the farm and say, "Whoa, haw, get up." [Laughter.] I tell you we can not afford to ruin the young manhood of the Union.

Some say that we are going to educate them. In every State in this Union you have a splendid system of public schools. People who own property pay a school tax. In McComb City, where I live, we have as fine public schools as there are in the world, and poor children go to those schools. Men who own property, whether they have children or not, are taxed to support the schools and educate the poor. It is the duty of every municipality, city, county, and State to maintain that system. With such a system, where is the man who loves the Republic that believes you ought to take the power of the Federal Government, grab this great school system by the throat, grab the young men by the nape of their necks, and put them in the camp and say that the Government will educate them? For what? They are fooling the boy; they are educating him to be a soldier.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. No; I can not yield; I have so little time. With somebody pulling the strings to bring on a war, the young men that they have fooled into this kind of an education would be again grabbed and put into an army, marched across the country or floated across the seas or taken by airplane through the air to fight some unknown enemy that he never heard of and had no hard feelings against.

We must realize what we are up against. Do not you know that there was an admiral of the Navy who almost brought on a real war between us and Huerta overnight because Huerta's ship commander would not fire a salute? Probably he did not have powder enough to get home. [Laughter.] But because he would not fire the salute we almost declared war against Mexico. So you see that the American Government can get into a war before it knows it. For that reason—that some man in high authority in our Government might desire war if it is certain that the war dogs are ready—you do not want to be too well prepared for war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FISHER, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. MILLER were given leave to extend their remarks.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, after the eloquent remarks of gentlemen who have preceded me my words will seem weak and powerless.

During the World's Fair in Chicago, nearly 30 years ago, amongst the thousands of paintings exhibited in the Building of Fine Arts, my attention was attracted above all other pictures to a canvas about 20 by 30 inches, showing an old farmer with a cloth gripsack in his hand. He wore boots. Maybe that one was run over at the heel; certainly they were not polished like an officer's. A woman, plainly a farmer's wife, stood upon that homely doorstep giving the last caress to a farmer boy of perhaps 21. Just three pathetic figures. The picture was entitled "Breaking Home Ties," and was later awarded highest honor. So the enduring prize will ever be given to principles which picture the American home. From there comes all our Nation's power. Every dollar of this twenty-six billion debt must be raised upon the industry and privation of all housewives, who may milk cows and work the butter with a cedar paddle or in some simple drudgery gather and pay this enormous sum by small amounts. There is no evasion of the facts. Every step of civilization and progress is supported by patient, intelligent toil. Military training camps wean a boy from willing work to the ambition of war maneuvers and high rank. Our future depends upon production of the farm home. Never in history was military training so little needed, while rural life is needing and deserving encouragement. Military training was not necessary when our country was weak. While we grew strong and powerful beyond compare, monarchies and kingdoms, thrones and dynasties were decaying to make room for poor men and women, who ever find God's greatest blessing in the joy of work.

America prospered because labor had some recognition. You must encourage home building, lighten the burdens in every way, plan bringing back to the soil the young men. When the boy starts military training he has left the farm forever. The girls quietly follow toward the city. Do not desert the certain, proven rules for our greatness to satisfy a clamor for the military, a frame of mind which this war has produced. Turn back before too late. We should, and labor will, take hold cheerfully and pay the debt. But meanwhile rich men must practice self-denial.

Labor must have incentive, recognition, and the reward of home. Luxury, ease, and idleness may be taxed from existence. Let all go to work and pay for the war we have had before starting another, because military training is a certain path to war.

Until the war of 1917 we were told that our form of government was only an experiment and would not stand the strain, causing some uneasiness regarding compulsory universal military training, but now, with other forms of government changed many times while ours endures, having given ours the acid test, with all other nations in the financial discard, we are urged to expend billions before the veterans of that war have had their pay. Reward your present soldiers before increasing the Army. As we got along so well without universal training against men trained to the minute, how can you claim to need training against all the other nations crippled? We were safe when Europe was strong and armed to the teeth. From where our numbers were few we lived to see Europe strewn with crowns and fading military vanity. From where now does this great demand for a large Army come? I will venture the opinion that the 18,000 new-made millionaires are unanimous that more boys come from the farms patriotic to the last drop of their sturdy youth.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman aware that the American Legion, which represents 1,600,000 ex-soldiers of the World War, are for universal training?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I am aware that they are not unanimously for it.

Mr. KAHN. A large majority have declared themselves for it.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. The officers, yes.

Mr. KAHN. And the men.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Not the privates.

Mr. KAHN. Has the gentleman heard the statement made by the committee who appeared before the Senate committee a few days ago, and who declared that they represented the private soldiers and officers?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I am aware of it.

Some States enlisted a large percentage of their population, who left their State and went to war willingly, not one-half of whom have returned to the State. Of our vast cash subscriptions gladly advanced during war times, not a dime has come back. Yes; war does stimulate trade and huge bank balances, but it tends to impoverish the home. Training camps wean away and to a large degree destroy in boys' minds that reverence for home. Your Nation must now and forever rely for strength upon the American home. Your legislation must consider measures which encourage youth to build and maintain their own homes. For every boy leaving home, some girl follows away. It is difficult to imagine a home throughout our country where the living conditions of our girls are not superior to that which we find here amongst so-called women war workers. These young women were brought here under false pretenses; pictures of fine dormitories and alluring prospects, which did not exist—left here with small pay and no recognition, to do the best they can, their future insecure.

What nation fears us?

Without fear there can be no war. [Applause.]

I yield to no man in my intense admiration for our great Army, firmly believing that without compulsory universal military training our future security is best served.

The greatest quality of mind is self-reliance and should be cultivated in the individual, diffusing through the home into the township, county, and State, stimulating those atoms to depending upon their own individual and united energy without governmental interference and parentalism.

Our present rather unsettled condition is the result of pride which precedes a fall. We have had a tumble from vain positions and must realize that progress and food only result from hard, consistent work. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the discussion this afternoon has been not only interesting but illuminating, I think, particularly as it has shown the attitude of mind held by various gentlemen with relation not only to the matter under consideration in the bill but with regard to matters about which the bill itself is utterly silent.

Sometimes criticism is made that general debate is of no significance, that the fact is evidenced by the very meager attendance. Yet I think anyone who will listen to the general debate on bills of such magnitude as the one before us, unless he be an expert in matters of this kind, will have his knowledge very much increased, and possibly his views modified and his general information with regard to legislation made of some worth to his constituents.

We are discussing an Army bill this afternoon. I suppose that the gentlemen who have criticized the Army and war would not undertake to say that any civilized country anywhere could get along without an army. If it were not a necessity born of the inherent weakness, ambition, and viciousness of certain phases of human society, we would have no occasion for the reorganization of the Army in this country.

I shall not hope to throw any light upon the bill, but any man who has been in Congress since the war began must have had his judgment challenged again and again with regard to what is wise, with regard to what is necessary, without consideration perhaps as to what is at the moment popular.

It was my privilege during the continuation of the war to visit one of our largest military camps. Personally I had never come in contact with any member of any considerable rank in the Regular Army. I was born and reared in an atmosphere which taught that all war was wrong, that even for the purposes of self-defense, under the teachings of the Master, there could be no occasion in which any man is justified in making war or put his means or talents to its ongoing.

While I had, I think, intellectually outgrown that conception, yet there lingered in my mind a prejudice deep and abiding against our Regular Military Establishment.

It was my privilege to visit one of the largest camps during the war. The general in charge told me that suddenly within four days 10,000 men had been stricken with the influenza. He had capacity for only 2,000 in his hospital. The day I arrived there men were dying at the rate of 77 per day, and it continued at that rate until the peak was reached. I said to myself, "What a fearful responsibility rests upon a man who has charge of 60,000 men," and I wondered what kind of man he was. When I went to the hostess house, within two or three minutes I was able to find exactly the location of the one to whom I had been called. I found him in a hospital, well taken care of. I remained there four days without anyone knowing that I was a Member of Congress. Accidently one day it was discovered that I was a Member of the House. Immediately those who were in touch with the general said, "Have you seen him?" Nothing would do but that I must go and pay him a visit. I was ignorant at that time of how sensitive, how anxious these men in responsible positions are with regard to the conduct of the things that they have under them. I was introduced to the general who had charge. I was struck not only by his executive ability, but I was forcibly struck with the human element, with the heart that was in the man. Yet that man said to me, "I came back here to take charge of this camp, and some of my friends said, 'We are mighty glad to see you,' and then I said to them, 'My God, men, why didn't you say so before?' I have been here before, and I have ridden on the trains, and I never wear my uniform unless I am compelled to, and men have met me in the sleeper and in the smoking room, and even the first thought was, 'You are at a butcher's trade.'" Yet that man had given 20 years of his life to the study of the artillery of the world, and when the day came that we needed the man, here was one who understood the German system, the French system, the English system, who knew what to do and how to do it. All honor to the boys who fought the war, but it seems to me that it is about time we recognize that that group of untrained men, drawn into the camps, did not automatically organize themselves into a great army that won the war. That gallant body of trained men of the Regular Army who knew how to do things organized that army, and without them the story would have been different. [Applause.] So I made up my mind if opportunity ever offered legitimately I would speak the name of Gen. Austin, who had command of that Artillery camp, and who impressed me as the equal, at least in intelligence, in conscience, in heart of any man on the floor of this House.

Let us be fair. I know the Regular Army idea was different from ours, and I can understand it. We spoke just recently here about units being broken up that had been taken from a locality. The Regular Army ideal is this: Between certain ages and with certain physical qualities, if you can take the young men and have complete control of them, disassociate them from local situations, you can make them live, move, and have their being in the Army, and they will make the most effective fighting machine known to the world. If that were the only consideration, they are absolutely correct, but our ideals conflict with that. To my own mind it is not the thing that we should do. I am not a military man. I have only touched at a tangent the National Guard. Two of my sons served three years each in the National Guard, and that National Guard company was taken to the border, and then this fight between the National Guard officers and those of the Regular Army began, and I confess to you that I was unable to determine from my meager knowledge the exact merits of the controversy, although some of my own personal friends—in fact, all in Army life of my own personal friends—were of the National Guard. A strange thing did happen, however. That company and a large part of that regiment that spent the time down on the border drilling thoroughly never got across to the other side except in the very last days of the war, which showed either that the National Guard had been absolutely incompetent and that therefore they were not prepared or that there had been blundering on the part of those who managed the war when they forced in men sometimes who had not had more than two or three weeks of training.

But it was not my purpose to criticize. It may be that the idea that I have with regard to the reserve force is a foolish one, but I believe that the hope of this country is in the love that the boy has for the locality in which he grew up, for the local associations that gathered around him in the formative days of his life, and that, although that might not make as effective an automatic fighting machine as those who have been called from every part of the country, yet when the testing time would come we can better trust to regiments, to companies that have been gotten together in particular neighborhoods that have been officered by men who will feel the responsibility of local criticism in respect to their treatment of the men. [Applause.]

A National Guard organization that would permit regiments to be formed in the congressional districts and officered by men in that district, so far as competent men could be found, would secure that unity of feeling and local pride in the organization that would make each community feel a proprietary interest in that much of the Army. A regiment thus organized would be proud of its history and around it would gather traditions of individual valor. Sons could be members of organizations in which their fathers had served. The training for the most part could be conducted at such times and places as would permit members of the family to witness the evolutions of the troops. The soldiers themselves would ever be conscious of civic duties as well as military. They would have before them always the very object for which an army exists—the defense of the home.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, during the war and since the signing of the armistice we have heard the statesmen, the pulpit, the platform orator, and the press all proclaim why we went to war with Germany. They have all given various reasons. Some said it was to make the world safe for democracy; others have said it was to pay a long-standing debt to France; while others, in fact most, say it was to crush forever militarism. I have always felt, and never hesitated to say, that we went to war with Germany because we had to as a matter of self-defense or self-protection. [Applause.] But, be that as it may, the speaker or writer, after giving his own particular reason why we went to war, almost invariably will say to further and forever crush out Prussian militarism. That was and is a common saying and reason, and it is based on good grounds, for article 173 of the proposed treaty with Germany provides:

> Universal compulsory military service shall be abolished in Germany. The German Army may only be constituted and recruited by means of voluntary enlistment.

So there would be no question that Germany must understand that she was not to have military training going on in any manner. They put another prohibition against it by adopting article 177, which reads:

> Educational establishments, the universities, societies of discharged soldiers, shooting or touring clubs, and, generally speaking, associations of every description, whatever be the age of their members, must not occupy themselves with any military matters. In particular they will be forbidden to instruct or exercise their members or to allow them to be instructed or exercised in the profession or use of arms.

That shows the feeling of the allied nations toward military autocracy. Our own Nation, through its representatives at this peace conference, helped to frame these provisions of that treaty, and I feel at least 70 to 75 per cent of our citizens indorsed their action and proclaimed "Well done."

But what do we confront to-day? We have the other 25 or 30 per cent, before this treaty is even ratified, using every means to establish the same system in this Nation. If it was bad to allow this system to remain intact in Germany, then why, I ask, can it be considered a good system for the United States?

I am not in favor of going as far in this country as did the framers of the treaty with Germany; I say, if the universities and colleges want to adopt military training as a part of their curriculum and let those who want to voluntarily enter it do so and receive the training, all well and good; but I am opposed to conscription during times of peace, and universal compulsory military training is nothing less than that. [Applause.]

If I were an ardent supporter of universal compulsory military training, I certainly would not be in favor of it at this time.

There can be no well-founded argument that it is necessary, as a matter of preparedness, for any immediate emergency or supposed emergency, for we are better prepared now, so far as well-trained man power is concerned, than any nation on earth—so it is not needed for that reason.

One of the greatest difficulties the world is facing to-day is underproduction. It is true in European countries, and it is also true in this country. Especially is this the case in the agricultural sections of the country. Labor was never so scarce on the farms. I am told thousands of boys taken from the farm and trained during the war have not returned to the farm, and never will. This may be due partly to high wages paid in the cities, but something at least has caused many former farm boys not to return to farm life after their service, and to such an extent it is alarming. To adopt either of the bills proposed it would take anywhere from seven hundred and fifty thousand to a million young men from four to five months of a year away from the farm, the factory, and fields of production, and place them in military camps, where they would be consumers and not producers.

True, these bills provide for four months of the year for training, but it will take a little time to get ready to go and also some time in returning from camp; but that is not all. The short period of four months would not have been suggested but for the fact that those who are ardently supporting these measures felt they might be able to get that kind of a measure passed, knowing it would be impossible to get one with a longer period of training. Let me say, if the proponents of universal military training ever get a bill through Congress providing for four months' training, with all or practically all the metropolitan press and various defense societies and militarists behind it, within a short time they will get one through providing for two years' training. I have heard Army officers here in Washington say we must eventually come to this.

In addition to the foregoing reasons, and many more I could assign, why should the already overburdened taxpayer be called on at this time to increase his burdens for this system? No one seems to give an accurate statement or even nearly so as to what the adoption of this system would cost. It is estimated $125 to $350 per man for this training. I have figures from a conservative officer giving an itemized account as follows:

Pay	$20.00
Transportation	50.00
Subsistence	63.60
Fuel, light	8.06
Quartermaster supplies and equipment	72.00
Clothing and equipage	69.76
Transportation, supplies	3.25
Water disposal (garbage)	3.65
Maintenance of transportation, rolling kitchens, ranges	2.12
Ordnance	17.60
Signal	2.10
Medical	5.05
Telegrams	.18
Rental and damages	2.25
Total	319.62

Which, I understand, has since been revised and is now about $348.

This does not include hundreds of millions of dollars for military establishments in which to train these boys, and millions more for the expense of the administration of it here in Washington. Therefore taking into consideration the figures of the military experts, as given and our experience heretofore with such figures, I would say add at least 50 per cent to these estimates and you may be close to right.

I do not hesitate to say it will cost from $340 to $350 to train each man for the period of four months, which means the training of 750,000 to 1,000,000 men at a cost of anywhere from two hundred and fifty millions to three hundred millions a year. And all this for what? To get ready for the next war, or just to give these young men a good physical training, as the militarist would have you believe? If it is to give physical training, why is it they take only the physically perfect and deny the youth who needs the physical training the privilege of it? We all know they will not take the physically weak, but only the strong.

There are many other ways they can get this physical training. I am not opposed to providing all that is necessary for any youth to take military training who wants to take it; but I am opposed to compelling him to take it in times of peace. I felt this way about it a few days ago when privileged to introduce a resolution in my party caucus declaring against it, in this session of Congress, and which was adopted by almost seven to one. I wish the Members of this House of the Republican Party would also show the courage to do likewise, if not in caucus then during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that this bill will never pass the Senate, nor any other bill for that matter, during this session of Congress which does not have in it a provision for universal compulsory military training. This bill will be given no consideration by the Senate whatever; but the measure known as the Wadsworth bill will be substituted for this, or there will be no legislation during this session of Congress in the way of reorganization of the military affairs of this country.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, if we pass this bill and the Senate passes a reorganization bill of their own, will it not go to conference?

Mr. AYRES. Most certainly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We do not have to accept their bill.

Mr. AYRES. That is why I say that unless there is a bill passed by the Senate containing a provision for compulsory military training there will be no reorganization legislation passed during this session of Congress, in my opinion, as the Senate intends to force universal compulsory training now or have no legislation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But if they pass one, it will go to conference, and then there will be a bill.

Mr. AYRES. Oh, well, we should go on record now, not wait for a conference to decide it nor till your national convention tells you what to do. This is your own individual responsibility as a Member of this House, and you should have the courage to meet it one way or the other, so far as this Congress is concerned. None of us can speak for the next Congress only as individuals; but the people of our respective districts will decide that matter as to whether they want a man to represent them in Congress on this question who does not hesitate to say where he stands, or one who would prefer to dodge the issue until after the election. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, ordinarily, under the great personal sorrow I have suffered within the last few days, I would be very much disinclined to participate in this discussion, but there is one feature in this bill that I have endeavored to give some attention to for several weeks that I desire to call to the attention of the committee, and that is with reference to the proposition involved in the bill providing for a permanent scheme of promotion in the Regular Army of the United States. It is a matter of very great and vital importance not only to the morale of the Army but to the men personally, and, as I see it, in the future the success of the esprit de corps of the officers of the Army of the United States. It is in a large measure a technical matter, and it is one that I fear has not been given very much consideration by the ordinary run of the Members of the House. You are aware that for a number of years promotions in the Army were made by regiments. For instance, a regiment that had a large number of old officers who might soon be retired, younger men, anxious to be promoted in the service, by influence or by personal solicitation or by good fortune, would be assigned to those regiments where there would be a number of vacancies, and by that method those who had these fortunate assignments—although they may not have been officers of superior intelligence or ability over their fellows—were fortunate in securing a rapid promotion. It was a great injustice to their fellow officers. Later on a system was devised to attempt to correct this injustice and inequality by making promotions according to the several branches of the service, and that system has been found to give very great dissatisfaction. Now an effort is being made in the bill which is up for consideration and which has been presented here by the Committee on Military Affairs that hereafter in the promotion scheme of officers in the Army of the United States to provide what is called a single list for promotions, and the committee has reported—I believe it is section 24a of the bill and some following sections—provisions seeking to carry out the general policy of a single list for promotions based upon the total length of actual commissioned service.

And, gentlemen, that is, as a matter of fact, the only correct policy and the only fair system that could be adopted by the Congress of the United States, because it gives absolute justice, absolute equity, to every officer in the Army of the United States. But unfortunately the committee in making its recommendations to this House and in preparing the draft of this bill has absolutely emasculated that principle and that policy by the exceptions it has made to the principle, and that is the proposition to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, and at an appropriate time I shall offer an amendment to eliminate certain language of the provision that has been suggested by the committee.

Now, on page 31 of the bill you will find this section makes up a list for future promotions. It provides that officers below the grade of colonel in the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Veterinary Corps, and enumerating all branches of the service, who were originally appointed in the Regular Army or Philippine Scouts prior to April 6, 1917, shall be arranged without changing the present order of officers.

And here is the objectionable language, gentlemen of the committee. Here is where the injustice comes in. Here is where the joker appears which vitiates the real principle that the committee is seeking to write into the bill when they used this language:

Shall be arranged without changing the present order of officers on the lineal list of their own branches, but otherwise as nearly as practicable according to the length of commissioned service.

Now, what is the effect of that language? The committee comes in here and says that they have after long deliberation come to the conclusion that the logical, fair, and just system of promotion, for the future promotion of officers of the Army, should be on the basis of a single line, arranged according to the total active commissioned service of the various officers. That is what they ought to do, but when they put in this proviso that they shall be arranged without changing the present order of officers on the lineal list of their own branches they absolutely vitiate their own principle, and it leaves men subject to the injustice they have endured for 20 years.

Take that large type of men who volunteered for services in the Spanish-American War before we had any draft. I have knowledge of this, because my youngest brother, if you will pardon a personal reference, was in that service, and it applies not only to that class but applies to hundreds of other officers of the United States who went into that war, and some of them served for one, two, or three years in the Volunteer service of the United States. There are hundreds of them. What is the effect of the proposition here pending? When the act of February 28, 1901, was passed they sought to correct the injustice that had existed theretofore, and it also appeared in that act, which under the construction of the War Department at that time absolutely put these men not on the lineal list according to the total length of the actual commissioned service, as the act on its face appeared to do, but put men as blocks and stops to promotion, based on that system; and if you carry this bill into effect and put these men on the list and do not recognize the total of active commissioned service of these other officers of the United States, we are going to perpetuate an injustice that has existed for 20 years, by which these commissioned officers have been penalized in rank and grade and pay and everything, and which means everything to the officers of the United States Army.

Mr. DONOVAN. Do you contend by this proviso it will keep them segregated in their several classes for the lineal pay?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely carrying out the old-established system of partiality, and there can not any member on the Military Affairs Committee dispute the correctness of that assertion? What is their answer? They say this injustice has existed so long that if you now undertake to correct the injustice that has existed for 20 years it will create dissatisfaction on the part of those officers affected. You might as well say that if a man were innocently convicted and put in the penitentiary and it was discovered that he was absolutely innocent, that he had become accustomed and reconciled to it for so long that clemency should not be extended to him. What is the practical effect of the operation of that system? These men have been deprived of their proper number in the various ranks. They have been penalized in the salaries they draw in a large number of cases, and in their promotion, and this bill seeks to perpetuate for all time that injustice. To show further the inconsistency of the Military Committee, they absolutely make five different specific exceptions to the rule which they themselves seek to establish.

They can not deny that. It is a bill, gentlemen, which, seeking to do one thing and declaring in favor of a certain specific policy, immediately thereafter puts in provisions giving favoritism to certain officers and certain groups, giving favoritism to them in their arrangements on the permanent lineal list that is to be made up; and, gentlemen, when the time comes, as I say, when this section shall be reached in the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule, I propose to offer an amendment to strike out the following words: "Without changing the present order of officers on the lineal list of their own branches," so that this list for permanent promotion shall be based fairly and squarely, without any exception, upon the basis of an officer's total actual commissioned service in the Army of the United States, whether with the Volunteers or otherwise.

I have conferred privately with some members of the committee and even in debate here on the floor I do not think they will deny the abstract justice of the position which I am assuming upon this bill. Their answer is one of a specious nature. Their answer is one of expediency. Their answer is that these men when they went in knew the position they were going to be assigned to, which is not an absolutely accurate statement of the facts. But when it comes down to the calm, searching analysis of the principle that they are seeking to invoke in this bill, I say they ought to stand by that principle without exception, and then hereafter every officer in the Army of the United States will know just exactly where he stands. He will know what his future is, and he will know that hereafter, neither by legislation nor by personal influence, will officers of equal capacity and equal merit be penalized under the provisions of any legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in this bill which refers to the Porto Rican Regiment of Infantry, and I think I should be derelict in my duty should I not take the floor of the House to emphasize the justice and wisdom of this provision. I refer to section 20, which reads as follows:

The Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry and the officers and enlisted men of such regiment shall become a part of the Infantry branch herein provided for, and its officers shall, on July 1, 1920, be recommissioned in the Infantry with their present grades and dates of rank, unless promoted on that date in accordance with the provisions of section 23 hereof.

Almost ever since the establishment of the Porto Rico Regiment we have vainly knocked at the doors of the War Department and of Congress asking for the incorporation of the regiment of Porto Rico into the Regular Army with the same rights, duties, privileges, and immunities of every member of the United States Army.

As organized by the act of 1916, the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry is a part of the permanent establishment of the United States Army, but the officers are entitled to promotion to and including the grade of lieutenant colonel only. This is an injustice. The officers should be transferred, as provided in this bill, to the lineal list of the Infantry as the only solution to the present stagnation, since the officers are not only confined to eternal service in Porto Rico but have no outlook, no incentive in their careers on account of the block which regimental promotion entails for them. These officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry are men who belong to our most distinguished families, and they are not second in their devotion to duty and loyalty to the flag to any officer in the United States Army. [Applause.]

These officers have made the Army their profession and lifelong occupation, having already devoted to it the best of their lives, many years of most efficient, loyal, faithful, and hard tropical service. They have been admitted into the regiment by passing the same moral, mental, professional, and physical examination for entrance and promotion as required in the Regular Army. About one-half of them are professional men—civil, electrical, mechanical, sanitary engineers, lawyers, teachers, accountants, graduates of first-class American and European colleges and universities. They have practically shown their ability and military qualifications, and they are entitled to be transferred into the lineal list of the Infantry. Soon after his visit to Porto Rico in 1913 the Member of the House, Hon. D. R. ANTHONY, relating to the Porto Rican Regiment, said:

From what I could see I was convinced that the Porto Rico Regiment was one of the best Infantry regiments in the Army, and the good work of the officers and men, which has made the regiment such a splendid one, is deserving of recognition on the part of the Government.

On the floor of the House Representative ANTHONY said, among other things:

The Porto Rico Regiment is one of the finest in our Army. Its officers, both American and Porto Rican, are a splendid lot of men, the equal of others of their rank in other branches of the service, and so deserving of the same privileges and opportunities for promotion.

During the Great War the Porto Rico Regiment was detailed to the Canal Zone, and it is unnecessary to exalt the important duties rendered by our men in that place. They were faithful, loyal, true to the national cause, and for their efficiency, ability, and devotion to duty they highly enjoyed the confidence of their superiors. Now, in accordance with this provision of the bill our regiment shall become a part of the Infantry, with the same footing of the continental American soldier. This satisfies entirely our aspirations. We can not willingly accept any discrimination between continental Americans and American citizens born in the island of Porto Rico.

We are entitled to the same rights, privileges, and immunities of every citizen of the United States, and on every occasion when we see that the policy of the United States tends to treat us as fellow citizens we feel a sincere sentiment of reciprocity and our love and devotion to the Nation grows stronger in our hearts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Porto Rico has expired.

Mr. DAVILA. May I have one minute more?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. DAVILA. The provision included in this bill recognizes our rights and will be an incentive to the officers of our regiment, and I am sure that you will not repent of this act of justice, which will be received with great enthusiasm by the Porto Rican people. That is what we want, equal rights and equal duties, equal burden and equal advantages under the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CULLEN, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. RAINEY of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that every gentleman who has spoken or may speak in general debate on this bill may have leave to revise and extend his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken or may speak on the bill may have leave to revise and extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does my colleague mean to limit it to remarks spoken by those who have engaged in general debate or during the progress of the debate on the bill?

Mr. KAHN. In general debate.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from California, Why not extend that to every Member of the House who desires to extend his remarks on this bill?

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection to that, but I thought it should be confined to this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; if the gentleman will confine it to the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has the gentleman any objection to the extension of remarks which have not been fully developed during the progress of the debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman include that?

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that every gentleman who addresses the committee on this bill, whether in general debate or under the five-minute rule, may have leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that every Member of the House have leave to print on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama adds to the request that every Member, whether he speak or not, may have the privilege of extending remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KAHN. On the bill. I modify my request to include that.

Mr. WALSH. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects to that. The Chair will put it in the other form. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all those who have spoken or who may speak on the bill may extend remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman from California think he ought to limit that to five legislative days?

Mr. KAHN. I will limit it to that.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman is that all Members who have spoken or who may speak on the bill may extend their remarks on the bill for five legislative days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Consent has been granted.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are absent on official business.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think I have ever troubled the Senate by rising to a question of personal privilege, and I do not want to dignify what I am about to say as anything so important; but there is a correction which I feel bound to make of a statement which appeared in the newspapers this morning.

Yesterday by many representatives of newspapers I was asked if I had anything to say in regard to the letter of the President. I replied to them one and all that I had no comment to make. This morning I see it stated in the Washington Post, and in quotation marks, that I said there was a delightful passage in the President's letter in regard to France. Of course I said nothing of the kind. I did not allude to any passage in the letter at all, and if I had alluded to the President's reference to France "delightful" is the last word I should have said, even in irony, for it was not a case for irony.

I think what the President said about France was most unfortunate. He said:

> Throughout the sessions of the conference in Paris it was evident that a militaristic party, under the most influential leadership, was seeking to gain ascendency in the counsels of France. They were defeated then, but are in control now.

I do not think that that is something which ought to be said about France. I believe it, as a matter of fact, to be unfounded. I think the reverse is the case, and I regret extremely such a reflection upon one of our associates in the war with Germany.

I have tried personally in these debates to avoid any reflection upon the powers with which we were associated in the Great War. Some criticism perhaps was unavoidable, but I should like to take this occasion to repeat what I have said before, that

I believe the feeling between this country and France has always been one of real friendship. We have had our differences and occasionally criticize each other, but I think the feeling between the two countries is very deep and very strong.

I think that a great debt of the civilized world is due to France, or a great gratitude I should rather say, for her wonderful services in the war. After all it was France that bore the brunt of the attack. It was her territory that was devastated, her farms that were destroyed, her people who were deported.

The gallantry, the unshrinking courage, and self-sacrifice with which she met the onslaughts of the Germans for four years will always remain a great monument to France and a subject of admiration to all men who believe in courage and patriotism and love of country.

I do not think that France is in the least militaristic. I think she desires to have protection against the repetition of such sufferings as she has endured, and I think that is a feeling which we all must share.

Mr. President, I am sorry that has been said by the President. I regret also that the President should have taken occasion to say something about Italy which seems to me to be wholly uncalled for. Opinions may differ as to the disposition of parts of the Adriatic littoral. I myself believe, and so stated when the question first arose, and I have never changed my opinion, that the city of Fiume ought to belong to Italy. Its population is Italian. But the President criticizes it because he says the argument for Fiume rests on military and strategic reasons. That is true. The control of the head of the Adriatic by Austria has been a source of danger, a seat of invasion of Italy by Austria for more than a century. That Italy should desire to protect herself by holding this strategic point at the end of the Adriatic is not only natural but right.

Our Monroe doctrine rests on the great fundamental principle of the right of every nation to provide for its own preservation. Under the pact of London, Italy could have received much more territory than she thinks of claiming now, but she preferred to give up everything in order that she might hold Fiume, not merely because of the sentiment that it was a city populated by men of her race but because it was her defense and protection in the future, and her holding of Fiume and Trieste would be a barrier against future wars.

Italy made enormous sacrifices in this war; she lost more than half a million men; she is not a rich country; she has suffered heavily financially; and she has come before the peace conference and the world and asked for this city, giving up the strip of coast which she was awarded by the pact of London, in order that she might protect herself. Since when has it become a crime for a nation to seek for self-protection? Italy's arms had been victorious; at the close of the war she had taken possession of these territories, and now for strategic reasons she asks for that city. To condemn Italy or any other country for demanding that which will be of value to her safety in the future seems to me to be a very harsh and unjust judgment.

I was one of those who believed that Danzig should be given to the Poles as the only exit for Poland. The whole valley of the Vistula is Polish; the city of Danzig is German. We were told that Danzig must not go to Poland, because the population of Danzig is German, although the population of the hinterland is Polish. We are told, however, when it comes to Fiume that Fiume must not be given to the Italians because, although the population of the city is Italian, the hinterland is Jugo-Slav.

Mr. President, from my point of view it is to be regretted that the President should have interfered in a question which does not concern us. It is our desire to be friends to both Italy and the Jugo-Slavs and not to make ourselves needlessly the arbiters of their fate; but, after all, our relations with Italy have been close for many years and have always been friendly. The sympathy of the United States has always been with Italy in her struggle against foreign oppression and foreign tyranny, and I am sorry that we should be put, as a country, in the position of deserting her now. The American people have deep regard for Italy. They know her history, her wonderful achievements in art and literature. They will resent this attempt of the President to deprive her of her safety in the future and of the Italian city redeemed from Austria by her victorious armies. I think the argument in favor of article 10 might have been made without going out of the way to say the things the President has seen fit to say about both France and Italy.

Mr. President, we have before us at this moment article 14, which provides for equality of voting in the council and assembly of the league. I have never had the slightest desire to make any attack of any kind upon Great Britain; I do not blame her for looking after her own interests; I wish we looked after our interests as well, instead of concerning ourselves entirely with the interests of other people; but, Mr. President, there should be no assembly of the nations where the United States is placed in an unequal position. Amendments were offered here by the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] which would have given us what we wanted, and that is an equal vote. I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who desires to exclude Canada or South Africa or New Zealand or Australia from a place and a vote in the league. They are not only self-governing dominions, they are democratic in their forms of government; but the Senate did not permit us to make that change, and it was absolutely essential that inequality of voting should be done away with.

I do not see how any American can consent deliberately to send the United States into the league with 1 vote against 6 votes for the British Empire or against a larger vote for any country that is also a member of the league. For this reason we adopted the fourteenth reservation, which is known as the Lenroot reservation. It is proposed here to prefix a sentence to it which will enable the league, if it is so minded, to adopt the principle of the Johnson amendment, to see to it that the United States has an equal vote with any power at the board, but which does not deprive the self-governing dominions of Great Britain of their voice and vote to which they feel, and with justice, that they are entitled. I hope, therefore, that the amendment I propose may be adopted.

Mr. President, I have one more word to say in regard to the letter of the President. The President says in that letter:

> For my own part I am not willing to trust to the counsel of diplomats the working out of any salvation of the world from the things which it has suffered.

The whole peace conference which framed the treaty and the league covenant was composed of diplomats; the result of their labors is an alliance, and every provision in the covenant of the League of Nations is left in the hands of diplomats. The representatives of the different countries sitting in the council and in the assembly are all diplomats, representing their own countries, governed by the interests of their own countries and acting from purely political motives and motives of expediency. Now, the President says that the salvation of the world must not be sought by the counsel of diplomats. That cuts out of the treaty every provision in it except article 10 and article 10 is not diplomatic; it is an appeal to naked force. That is why we so much object to it; that is why the country so much objects to it; it is naked force for which each nation is made individually responsible.

There is not one objection which has been made by the most extreme opponents of the league and of article 10, particularly, that is not admitted and advocated in the letter of the President. Article 10 is the one pure force article in the covenant. He discards all the others and stands on that alone. It is well that he has said it; the issue can be veiled no longer; it justifies the position that we on this side, all alike, have taken, that there must be no obligation imposed on the United States to carry out the provisions of article 10.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, inasmuch as the letter of the President has been referred to, I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The President's letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 8 March, 1920.

MY DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: I understand that one or two of your colleagues do me the honor of desiring to know what my views are with reference to Article X of the League of Nations and the effect upon the League of the adoption of certain proposed reservations to that Article. I welcome the opportunity to throw any light I can upon a subject which has become so singularly beclouded by misapprehensions and misinterpretations of every kind.

There is no escaping the moral obligations which are expressed in positive terms in this article of the covenant. We won a moral victory over Germany far greater even than the military victory won on the field of battle, because the opinion of the whole world swung to our support and the support of the nations associated with us in the great struggle. It did so because of our common profession and promise that we meant to establish "an organization of peace which should make it certain that the combined power of free nations would check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that cannot be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned." This promise and assurance were written into the preliminaries of the armistice and into the preliminaries of the peace itself and constitute one of the most sacred obligations ever assumed by any nation or body of nations. It is unthinkable that America should set the example of ignoring such a solemn moral engagement.

For myself, I feel that I could not look the soldiers of our gallant armies in the face again if I did not do everything in my power to remove every obstacle that lies in the way of the adoption of this particular article of the covenant, because we made these pledges to them as well as to the rest of the world and it was to this cause they deemed themselves devoted in a spirit of crusaders. I should be forever unfaithful to them if I did not do my utmost to fulfill the high purpose for which they fought.

I think, my dear Senator, we can dismiss from our minds the idea that it is necessary to stipulate in connection with Article X the constitutional methods we should use in fulfilling our obligations under it. We gain nothing by such stipulations and secure nothing which is not already secured. It was understood as a matter of course at the conference in Paris that whatever obligations any government assumed or whatever duties it undertook under the treaty would of course have to be fulfilled by its usual and established constitutional methods of action. Once or twice in meetings of the conference, when the treaty was under consideration, "reservations" were made to that effect by the representatives of individual powers, and those "reservations" were invariably received in the way in which men who have met for business and not for talk always receive acts of scrupulous supererogation—listening to with indifferent silence, as such men listen to what is a matter of course and was not necessary to say.

There can be no objection to explaining again what our constitutional method is and that our Congress alone can declare war or determine the causes or occasions for war, and that it alone can authorize the use of the armed forces of the United States on land or on the sea. But to make such a declaration would certainly be a work of supererogation.

I am sorry to say that the reservations that have come under my notice are almost without exception not interpretations of the articles to which it is proposed to attach them but in effect virtual nullifications of those articles.

Any reservation which seeks to deprive the League of Nations of the force of Article X cuts at the very heart and life of the covenant itself. Any League of Nations which does not guarantee as a matter of incontestable right the political independence and integrity of each of its members might be hardly more than a futile scrap of paper, as ineffective in operation as the agreement between Belgium and Germany which the Germans violated in 1914. Article X as written into the Treaty of Versailles represents the renunciation by Great Britain and Japan, which before the war had begun to find so many interests in common in the Pacific; by France; by Italy—by all the great fighting powers of the world of the old pretensions of political conquest and territorial aggrandizement. It is a new doctrine in the world's affairs and must be recognized or there is no secure basis for the peace which the whole world so longingly desires and so desperately needs. If Article X is not adopted and acted upon, the governments which reject it will, I think, be guilty of bad faith to their people whom they induced to make the infinite sacrifices of the war by the pledge that they would be fighting to redeem the world from the old order of force and aggression. They will be acting also in bad faith to the opinion of the world at large to which they appealed for support in a concerted stand against the aggressions and pretensions of Germany. If we were to reject Article X or so to weaken it as to take its full force out of it, it would mark us as desiring to return to the old world of jealous rivalry and misunderstandings from which our gallant soldiers have rescued us, and would leave us without any vision or new conception of justice and peace. We would have learned no lesson from the war but gained only the regret that it had involved us in its maelstrom of suffering. If America has awakened, as the rest of the world has, to the vision of a new day in which the mistakes of the past are to be corrected, it will welcome the opportunity to share the responsibilities of Article X.

It must not be forgotten, Senator, that this article constitutes a renunciation of wrong ambition on the part of powerful nations with whom we were associated in the war. It is by no means certain that without this article any such renunciation will take place. Militaristic ambitions and imperialistic policies are by no means dead even in the counsels of the nations whom we most trust and with whom we most desire to be associated in the tasks of peace. Throughout the sessions of the conference in Paris it was evident that a militaristic party, under the most influential leadership, was seeking to gain ascendency in the counsels of France. They were defeated then, but are in control now. The chief arguments advanced in Paris in support of the Italian claims on the Adriatic were strategic arguments, that is to say, military arguments, which had at their back the thought of naval supremacy in that sea. For my own part, I am as intolerant of imperialistic designs on the part of other nations as I was of such designs on the part of Germany.

The choice is between two ideals: on the one hand, the ideal of democracy, which represents the rights of free peoples everywhere to govern themselves, and on the other hand, the ideal of imperialism which seeks to dominate by force and unjust power, an ideal which is by no means dead and which is earnestly held in many quarters still. Every imperialistic influence in Europe was hostile to the embodiment of Article X in the covenant of the League of Nations, and its defeat now would mark the complete consummation of their efforts to nullify the treaty. I hold the doctrine of Article X to be the essence of Americanism. We cannot repudiate it or weaken it without at the same time repudiating our own principles.

The imperialist wants no League of Nations, but if, in response to the universal cry of the masses everywhere, there is to be one, he is interested to secure one suited to his own purposes, one that will permit him to continue the historic game of pawns and peoples—the juggling of provinces, the old balances of power, and the inevitable wars attendant upon these things. The reservation proposed would perpetuate the old order. Does anyone really want to see the old game played again? Can anyone really venture to take part in reviving the old order? The enemies of a League of Nations have by every true instinct centered their efforts against Article X, for it is undoubtedly the foundation of the whole structure. It is the bulwark, and the only bulwark, of the rising democracy of the world against the forces of imperialism and reaction.

Either we should enter the league fearlessly, accepting the responsibility and not fearing the rôle of leadership which we now enjoy, contributing our efforts towards establishing a just and permanent peace, or we should retire as gracefully as possible from the great concert of powers by which the world was saved. For my own part, I am not willing to trust to the counsel of diplomats the working out of any salvation of the world from the things which it has suffered.

I believe that when the full significance of this great question has been generally apprehended, obstacles will seem insignificant before the opportunity, a great and glorious opportunity, to contribute our overwhelming moral and material force to the establishment of an international régime in which our own ideals of justice and right may be made to prevail and the nations of the world be allowed a peaceful development under conditions of order and safety hitherto impossible.

I need not say, Senator, that I have given a great deal of thought to the whole matter of reservations proposed in connection with the ratification of the treaty, and particularly that portion of the treaty which contains the covenant of the League of Nations, and I have been struck by the fact that practically every so-called reservation was in effect a rather sweeping nullification of the terms of the treaty itself. I hear of reservationists and mild reservationists, but I cannot understand the difference between a nullifier and a mild nullifier. Our responsibility as a nation in this turning point of history is an overwhelming one, and if I had the opportunity I would beg everyone concerned to consider the matter in the light of what it is possible to accomplish for humanity rather than in the light of special national interests.

If I have been truly informed concerning the desire of some of your colleagues to know my views in this matter, I would be very glad if you should show this letter to them.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, inasmuch as the President in his latest letter on the treaty has seen fit to pay particular attention to those Senators who have felt that while we had obligations abroad we should first protect the sovereignty and independence and peace of the United States, I should like to say just a word on the same line.

Some of us really have felt that the President was sincere in his conviction that a League of Nations, subscribing to certain covenants and agreements, could materially influence for good the peace of the world, and we have consistently endeavored to bring this about, insistent at all times, however, that the interests of the United States first should be unquestionably preserved. Apparently, the President, by the clear terms of his latest utterance, despite the indisputable lack of protection developed through debate, still is as insistent as ever that the United States must join this international corporation without reservation or protection, and to that extent I can not and will not follow him.

The President says that he "can not understand the difference between a nullifier and a mild nullifier." I thoroughly agree with him; but I do see a distinct difference between an "America-first" citizen and one who, apparently obsessed by what at one time seemed the possibility of world power, is still willing to pledge the resources and men of the United States and engulf them in the maelstrom of Europe without qualification, so that if Congress should question the merit of a controversy abroad, the honor of this Nation could be impugned and America be accused of repudiating an unqualified agreement.

Some of us have been and are ready and willing to provide that America, which evaded no responsibility in time of war, should evade none in time of peace; but we insist that America, and America alone, shall decide each individual case without its honor and integrity being under the slightest question or review.

The President suggests that it is unnecessary "to stipulate in connection with article 10 the constitutional methods we should use in fulfilling our obligations under it," and, further, that "we gain nothing which is not already secured." He ignores utterly the main question, which, in my judgment, has influenced those Senators who have been insistent upon the American reservation to article 10. This reservation protects America's people from sacrifice on European battle fields, but, more than that, it protects America's honor. Protects America's honor—that in itself is more than sufficient to justify this reservation.

It seems to me that this should be considered a matter of paramount importance; it protects America's honor because it permits Congress, which is America, to use its own judgment and give consideration to justification before it passes on a declaration of war, or permits American boys to engage in European conflicts. No one questions that the entire power of making war rests solely and alone with Congress. That is not the issue and never has been. I differ with the President as to the necessity of the reservation because without this stipulation the American Congress automatically would be bound to enter a war under article 10, or else to sacrifice a moral obligation and thus sacrifice America's honor, which no true American ever would permit.

The President, with that familiar touch of sentimentalism, tells us, "I feel I could not look our soldiers in the face again if I did not do everything in my power to remove every obstacle that lies in the way of the adoption of this particular article of the covenant." In similar language, but in all sincerity, I feel that I could not look those brave soldiers in the face if, as a Member of the United States Senate, I voted for an agreement which, on its very face, demands that we resend American armies to defend territory secured by conquest and intrigue, and to do so without the Congress of the United States being, in effect, permitted to pass on the justification for the invasion. It is said that the first call anticipates an American Army of 250,000 men to maintain peace among the Kurds, Turks, and Armenians. Yes; having been governor of a great State during the period of the formation of our Army, and having personally reviewed and witnessed thousands and thousands of boys from our own State leaving for Europe, and having witnessed the arrival of hundreds of thousands of boys from practically all the States of the Union, who had sailed from Jersey's shores—having realized by such close observation the suffering and the sacrifices, and having met the remnants of these units on their return to Jersey's shores—having, as I say, witnessed all this at closest range, I indeed would hesitate to look a soldier in the face if by my vote we deliberately agreed for all time to come and without question, unless we repudiated our moral obligations, to defend foreign territory and enter into foreign entanglements which, from the very outset, means a large army of these boys permanently on foreign soil.

If it be necessary, in order to try out this experiment of supergovernment, to enlist the United States as a member without a square, positive, understandable reservation that the elected Congress of this country shall, without question of honor or integrity, pass on every call for "crusaders," as they are called, to be sent abroad, then count me positively and emphatically in opposition.

Frankly, I regret that, apparently, it is impossible for the experiment of a world's parliament to be tried out, and further regret that the President of our people is more insistent than even such British authorities as Earl Grey, Lord Burnham, and others, who do not seem to question the American reservations and who do seem to understand and approve the sound reasons for these American safeguards. I regret all this because I at all times have seen in the league, with proper restrictions, an opportunity for good. However, the die is cast. If America can not be protected, America can not afford to risk its all—to risk its honor, the lives of its young men, its resources, subject always to the control of the selfish politicians abroad, whose imperialistic designs and determination have been made clearer and clearer while the days of sacrifices seem to have been rapidly forgotten.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I hesitate somewhat to break into the discussion of the treaty with an outside matter, but perhaps it is well to mix them up a little.

I should like to call the attention of Senators to a remarkable statement which has been put out over the country by Mr. McAdoo, and the astonishing credence which some of the newspapers give to his remarks. They are even taken seriously.

This matter has been mentioned in the House of Representatives, but it seems to me it should be called to the attention of every Senator who wishes to consider the financial conditions of this country to-day.

What is Mr. McAdoo's scheme? He proposes to reduce taxes a billion dollars. He knows that that, of course, is popular with the American people. It is always popular to reduce taxes, and it is a thing that we should try to do; but let us see how he proposes to do it.

His scheme, which has been published and commented on elaborately all over the country, is, first, not to collect $500,000,000 a year which foreign countries owe us for interest on loans of $10,000,000,000 or over, and to fund that interest into bonds, and sell the bonds to the people. His next scheme is to postpone for two years the collection of the sinking fund which the Congress provided for when it issued these bonds, in order that we might immediately commence carrying out that soundest principle of finance, reducing the Government debt. That would make, he says, $750,000,000, and in some way he says we ought to save $250,000,000, making a billion dollars, and immediately reduce the taxes.

Aside from any principle of destroying the present value of Government bonds in the market, let me invite the attention of the Senate for a moment to the present condition of the Treasury of the United States. Why, Mr. President, the estimates of the heads of the executive departments of this Government for 1921, together with the deficit of last year, and those sums which we have already incurred, make the present estimates for next year close to $10,000,000,000; and the most that can be hoped by way of Government income for the next year, under the present rate of taxation, is $6,000,000,000. I am speaking in round figures. I was under the impression that the distinguished former Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. GLASS], who is now a Member of the Senate, was opposed to the issuance of Government bonds; and yet Mr. McAdoo says:

> Let us issue $750,000,000 more of Government bonds, and in some way save $250,000,000, and reduce the taxes immediately by that amount.

Why, Mr. President, in the first place, $250,000,000 is nothing to what we should save. In the second place, everybody knows that the issuance of more bonds at this time or at any time following this war is the height of folly in finance. It will not only continue that inflation which has prevailed during the war but it will endanger the present system of credit in this country; and nothing will tend to depress the twenty billions of bonds outstanding more than to take away the sinking fund and to sell additional bonds at a greater rate of interest. The Government can not sell more bonds at the present rate, with bonds selling subject to surtax at practically 90 cents on the dollar. The Government must sell its bonds, then, under par, or make them totally exempt from taxation, or increase very largely the rate of interest; and then if we take away the sinking-fund provision or sell bonds tax exempt, or at a higher rate of interest, where will the present twenty billions of Government bonds go to in the market? They are the basis of a large amount of the credits of this country on which the business of the country is being transacted. But Mr. McAdoo seems to think that when you give a bond or a note you have paid a debt. That was always a very important part of his financial education. He never considered the question of payment in finance—only the question of running in debt—and that is the basis on which he is recommending to-day that the Congress of the United States shall manage the finances of this country in the future.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the bond speculators and Wall Street would be very glad to have a bond issue. They are always pleased with that, and I have no doubt that Mr. McAdoo reflects the opinion of many people in what might be called high finance; but the business interests of this country, the small merchants, the business men, know that if we are going to continue our prosperity, inflation must cease, economy must be the rule instead of extravagance, and we must stop issuing bonds and start upon the back road of retrenchment.

Mr. President, it is proposed to save $250,000,000 and reduce taxes a billion dollars. Why, if you did that, that would make nearly four billions of deficit instead of three. I do not know of anybody in this country who has added more to the losses of the Government than Mr. McAdoo has when he insisted on taking over the railroads. The wild extravagance that ensued, and the McAdoo schemes of finance, have cost this Government more than a billion dollars, and now he is talking about retrenchment.

Mr. President, we must face the fact that with the present income of this Government there is a deficit of $3,000,000,000 for this year to be carried over to next year. What are we going to do? The House of Representatives in the present Congress has announced, and it is announced by members of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, that they propose to cut the estimates about a billion and a quarter. We hope to keep in the Treasury untouched a billion dollars appropriated to purchase the wheat crop; and I think we will, unless we knock the bottom out of the wheat market and compel the Government to buy all the balance of it. Even then there is bound to be a large deficit next year, and there is but one thing for this Congress to do, to discard these schemes and get down to the bedrock basis of economy in expenditures, so that we may at an early date begin to reduce taxes. It can be done if we will set our faces against the wild extravagance which has been going on and which is incident no doubt to a great extent to war.

Nothing will hurt this country more than to start another régime of issuing and selling Government bonds. England saw the danger and a year ago recommended that immediately they should put in force a sinking fund for retiring their bonds.

Mr. President, this is a question to which the Finance Committee and Appropriations Committee should give the most careful attention, because with the inflated condition of our currency, with high prices, our business in this country is in a very dangerous condition and it can not be remedied by continuing the issuance of bonds. I am very anxious to commence the reduction of taxes as I know that many of these taxes are but added to the cost of the necessaries of life, but I believe in doing it through economy and saving rather than issuing more bonds to avoid levying taxes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am in favor of passing the treaty immediately and am quite ready to support the resolution of ratification either with "interpretative reservations," agreeable to President Wilson, or the "Hitchcock reservations," or the "Lodge reservations." The differences are not sufficiently important to justify delay in declaring peace.

The country, with just cause, overwhelmingly demands it, and is incensed with all those who delay it.

The treaty of peace should pass at once because—

1. Our laws should be on a legal peace basis—not on a war basis. The reduction of the high cost of living demands it. The social unrest in our country demands it.

2. All rules and regulations based on war and all war boards and commissions should be revoked. With peace comes automatic repeal of war measures.

3. Our relations with enemy nations are definitely fixed by the treaty, determining our rights as a Nation and as citizens. Billions of dollars are involved, including all alien property, Americans' properties in alien enemy countries, all war damages, and our trade, social, and political relations.

4. The ratification will stabilize Europe and the reconstruction of the nations. It will enable them to pay us, and thus lower our taxes and lower our high cost of living thereby.

5. The more rapid restoration of Europe's productive activities means their self-support, larger exports to us, greater supplies for Europe and for us.

6. It will cause the rise in value of European currency and international exchange, and restore many impaired fortunes.

7. It will strengthen the prestige and standing of the United States, and improve our political, social, and trade relations with all other nations.

8. It will help to end the starvation, social unrest, and growth of radical socialism and bolshevism in Europe.

The covenant of the League of Nations ought to pass, because—

(a) It provides for a mechanism to settle all international disputes, (1) by diplomacy, (2) by conciliation, (3) by arbitration, (4) by a court of international justice, (5) by the council, (6) by the assembly, (7) by delay, (8) by agreeing to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of member nations, and (9) to preserve it, (10) by boycott, (11) by blockade, and, if necessary, (12) by military and naval force.

(b) (14) It provides for gradual disarmament on land and sea, to abate the high taxes of preparation for war. (15) It ends conscription and (16) abates private munition making. (17) It ends secret treaties and (18) gives publicity to all war preparations. (19) It provides a world forum where subject peoples can bring their grievances. (20) It establishes a world assembly where all nations may meet in conference and develop the principles which will promote the peace and happiness of mankind. (21) It ends military autocracies and establishes for all time the rule of civilized democracies. It ushers in a new great era where the diligence, providence, and creative genius of mankind can fully function under the blessings of peace and liberty.

REASONS FOR DEFEATING TREATY NOT JUSTIFIED.

After 12 months of discussion the only irreconcilable difference remaining unadjusted between the President, Senator HITCHCOCK, and Senator LODGE appears to be over article 10, which provides:

"The high contracting parties undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the League.

"In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the executive council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled."

President Wilson, Senator HITCHCOCK, and Senator LODGE are in accord on the United States undertaking "to respect" the territorial integrity and existing political independence of member Nations, but differ on the United States undertaking "to preserve" the territorial integrity, and so forth.

All three agree that the United States undertake "to respect," the territorial integrity, and so forth. President Wilson insists that the United States also undertake "to preserve" the territorial integrity, and so forth, subject to interpretative reservations.

Senator HITCHCOCK agrees that the United States undertake "to preserve," but not to use military or naval forces or the economic boycott "to preserve" unless Congress authorizes.

Senator LODGE refuses to agree that the United States undertake "to preserve" by any means whatever, unless Congress authorizes in each particular instance.

All the world agrees "to respect and preserve." President Wilson and Senator HITCHCOCK agree "to respect and preserve," Senator LODGE "to respect" but not "to preserve" unless Congress authorizes in each particular instance.

It is my opinion that with the overthrow of all the military dynasties and the world-wide establishment of democracies, and the League of Nations with its covenanted safeguards, the world's peace is assured even if the United States remains out.

But to keep the United States out of the league because of the very small differences between the President and Senator LODGE would be defeating a very great end for a very small end. They agree on 99 per cent of the German treaty and are liable to destroy it over a 1 per cent difference. To keep the United States out of the moral leadership of mankind would be a great wrong. To defeat the treaty would be a national calamity and would discredit the United States throughout the world.

If the President's view prevailed on article 10 no declaration of war or voting of war supplies could be possible without congressional action, and Congress would do what was morally right without the supposed moral coercion of article 10 "to preserve," and so forth, as Congress did in the case of Cuba and in the last Great War.
